

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

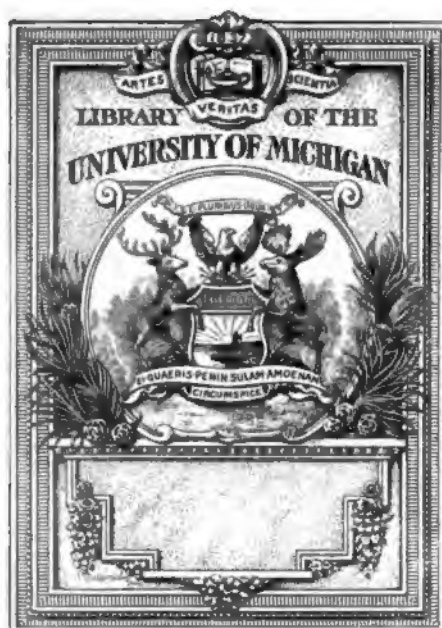

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. MOTIONS.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT SECURITIES—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, the suitability of Colonial Government Inscribed Stocks for Trust investments should be more adequately recognized,"—
(Sir George Baden-Powell) 660
After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ECCLESIASTICAL ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND)—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient that Assessments for Ecclesiastical purposes in Scotland should be maintained, and that in lieu thereof an equivalent annual assessment ought to be made for assisting Secondary Education in Scotland,"—(Mr. Hunter) 683

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as the Ecclesiastical Assessments have been a burden upon land from time immemorial for the erection and repair of church buildings in the old parishes of Scotland, this House, in the absence of any grievance connected therewith, except in the case of feuars, for whose relief a Bill is now before Parliament, declines to entertain a proposal to alienate these assessments to secular uses,"—(Mr. James Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 111, Noes 148; Majority 37.

Division List, Ayes and Noes 708

After short debate, Main Question, as amended, put:—The House divided; Ayes 143, Noes 104; Majority 39.—(Div. List, No. 166.)

Resolved, That as the Ecclesiastical Assessments have been a burden upon land from time immemorial for the erection and repair of church buildings in the old parishes of Scotland, this House, in the absence of any grievance connected therewith, except in the case of feuars, for whose relief a Bill is now before Parliament, declines to entertain a proposal to alienate these assessments to secular uses.

And it being One of the clock a.m., Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

MATTER—considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to authorise the repayment of the sum of Three thousand two hundred and seventy-five pounds Three pounds per Centum Consolidated Annuities, being the sum deposited in respect of the application to Parliament for 'The Enniskillen, Bundoran, and Sligo Railway (Donegal Extension) and Enniskillen and Bundoran Extension Railway (Abandonment) Act, 1879,' which in pursuance of section thirty-six of that Act is now forfeited, together with any interest or dividends thereon."

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.) said, he hoped that care would be taken to see that all the provisions of the Act were fully complied with by those who were promoting this Bill. He had no objection to its passing through the present stage; but he thought the Committee ought to have some assurance that all the necessary notices had been duly served.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

LIBEL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 17.] COMMITTEE.

[Progress 6th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 5 (Where defendant in action for libel has raised plea under s. 2 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, only special damage to be recovered in certain cases. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 2).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) said, that he was altogether in favour of the principle of the clause; but he thought it required a few words by way of explanation; because from what fell from his hon. and learned Friend the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell), the last time they were considering the Bill, he did not think that its meaning was thoroughly understood. By the section referred to in the clause—namely, s. 2, 6 & 7 Vict. where a libel had really worked no damage, three things were necessary before an editor could get a verdict. He must prove those three things himself, and if he failed in any one of them the case went against him. First of all, he must show that there had been no negligence in inserting the libel; secondly, that an apology such as the Act required had been made; and, thirdly, he must pay into Court a certain sum of money. This section sought to do away with that part of the plea which required the payment of money into Court, and to say that it would really be a good plea without the third requirement. It was obvious that the justice of this provision would be manifest to the Committee when he said that news was circulated by means of news agencies, and that it frequently happened that the person who complained had sustained no injury at all. Why should not the editor be permitted to show that there had been no damage, that a mistake had been made, for which he apologized, and that there had been no negligence as far as he was concerned? In that case, why should he have to pay a sum of money into Court? The Committee would be aware that the news circulated by the news agencies, with which every hon. Member must necessarily be familiar, was inserted in a great number of newspapers, and in many instances, although a mistake might have been committed, the person complaining had suffered no real injury at all. This clause provided that in such cases the editor should prove the first of the pleas, and show that no damage had been sustained. The mischief of having to pay money into Court was that it made his position that there had been no damage untenable. He practically admitted that he had done something wrong; because, although he justified what had been done, he said that there must have been some measurable damage sustained, or it would not be necessary to pay anything into Court. When a sum of, say £5, was paid into Court, the jury naturally said—"The defendant admits that he has injured the plaintiff to the extent of £5;" and that being so, they would estimate the damage at probably more than that sum, and find the verdict accordingly. That was the practical effect of requiring the payment of a sum of money into Court. Where a man had not been damaged in any way whatever, why should not the defendant be able to say—"I certainly put this paragraph in my paper; there was no negligence, but a sort of inadvertence, if the word may be used, similar to that which must necessarily occur in carrying on the business of life, even without negligence. I have done all I can in the way of making an apology. You have not been injured in the least, and where a man has not been injured, why on earth should I have to pay money into Court." It appeared to him that in principle the clause was right; because in a great many other matters besides this something wrong might have been done, and yet no actual injury inflicted. For instance, a Hansom cab might drive so close to him as to put him into a fright; but he could not bring that action, as he had not been hurt. Why, in that case, should persons who trade in those sort of actions be treated differently? Why should not the jury be allowed to say to them—"Even if a wrong has been committed upon you, you have suffered no damage from it." If the editor had behaved as a respectable man ought to behave, he should be allowed to plead that the plaintiff had sustained no injury. That was the simple action of the clause.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) said, that his objection to the clause was contained in the last part of the 1st paragraph, which provided that if—"The defendant has inserted an apology, as by the said Act provided, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to recover any damages except such special damages as he can prove that he has sustained by the publication of such libel."

He agreed with all that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Addison) had said, and considered it desirable that the 2nd section of the existing Act, 6 and 7 Vict., should be repealed. But there might be cases in which general damage might have been sustained by the person libelled, which such person, from the position he occupied or his professional interests, could not prove to have done him any material damage in the sense of sustaining a material loss of income, or in any other way. That might frequently occur if a man were not engaged in carrying on a trade. At the same time he might be injured in his reputation and general character in his own neighbourhood, and for that injury it was right that the person who inflicted it should give him compensation in the only way in which it could be given by a stranger—that was to say, by a money payment. He understood that his hon. Friend in charge of the Bill (Sir Algernon Borthwick) would have something to say on that point, and would propose an Amendment. He thought it was desirable, before the Committee came to a decision as to whether they should omit the clause or not, they should hear what his hon. Friend had to say on the subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, the point was this: as the clause was framed, it proposed that a plaintiff should not be entitled to any damages unless he could prove special damage. It appeared to him, now that the matter had been discussed, that there might be cases in which a person had been seriously libelled, and would not be able to prove special damages—as, for instance, in the case of a small tradesman who was accused of fraud, or of some sharp practice, but who was not able to show that he had lost custom in consequence. He thought that was hardly a case in which a Committee should say that the person libelled should get no damages unless he could prove that he had suffered special damages, assuming, of course, that the newspaper proprietor could show that he had not been guilty of malice or of gross negligence. He was anxious to give the promoters all the assistance in his power, provided that its provisions did not go beyond what he personally deemed to be just. He would, therefore, ask the promoters of the measure whether it would not be as well to consider whether some limits should not be proposed, otherwise there was a strong argument against the clause in connection with this question of proving special damage. He thought it was possible that the clause might be amended, either by limiting the amount of damages or in some other way. As it stood, it clearly went too far.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) said, that this was really a question of costs.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, that that was so; it was now held that if the defendant was to get a verdict, there was no power to make him pay any costs at all. There was no power at the present moment to make the defendant pay costs where the judgment passed in his favour. Therefore, the hon. Baronet was perfectly right in saying that the Bill would not affect the case where a judgment was given for the defendant. The Court, however, had the discretion where the judgment was given for the plaintiff. If the judgment passed for the defendant on the two issues of absence of malice and absence of negligence, the plaintiff, although libelled, and justified in bringing the action, would get no costs.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, that he had handed in an Amendment that morning, and though he understood that it would not be in Order to move it at that stage, he should vote for the clause if it were passed, with the intention of moving his Amendment at the proper time. That Amendment was to omit the last words of the paragraph, and to add at the end, that a defendant should be entitled to judgment, unless the plaintiff should recover a verdict of 40*s.* damages at the least. The effect of that Amendment would be this—suppose a plaintiff went into Court and failed to prove that the libel had been published with malice or negligence, and it also appeared that the defendant had inserted an apology; in that case, although the plaintiff might get a technical verdict, yet, if it were for anything less than 40*s.* it would not entitle him to what that verdict would otherwise bring. Where the defendant had published an apology and showed that there had been no negligence and that no damage had been sustained, unless the plaintiff got more than 40*s.* awarded as damages, the plaintiff would not get a judgment that would entitle him to recover costs. That appeared to him to meet the objection of the hon. and learned Attorney General, and he should have been glad if that proposal, consistently with the Rules of the House, could have been put. As he understood that that could not be done at the present moment, the only course left open to him was to vote for the clause as it stood.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) rose to Order. He wished to know whether it was possible to move any Amendment on the Question “that the Clause do pass?”

THE CHAIRMAN: No Amendment can be moved.

MR. DARLING said, his impression was that any hon. Member voting for the clause could do so with the intention of amending it in some direction at a later stage. For his own part he should like to say that he would vote for the clause if it were pressed that day, only with the intention of moving the Amendment at a later stage.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK said, he wished to have the clause put as it stood at present.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) said, that the hon. and learned Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Addison) had talked about a libel that did no injury. He imagined that it would be very difficult to produce a case in which a libel had inflicted no injury. He would give an instance of a case which occurred a short time ago in order to show the difficulty a man had in proving that he had sustained any special injury. The case to which he referred was one in which, in consequence of a printer's error, the name which should have appeared last in the list of dissolutions of partnership was the first inserted among the bankruptcy notices. That was a somewhat serious matter for the persons concerned; but how was it possible for them to prove special damages. That, he was afraid, was only one case out of many which constantly occurred. The question was whether the existing law in this respect was not better than that which it was now proposed to substitute. It must be remembered that the existing law had been materially altered after much consideration, and as it now stood it was an improvement made by 8 and 9 Vict. c. 75, upon the provisions of an Act passed two years before, viz., 6 and 7 Vict. c. 96. There was one point he desired to lay before the Committee which was of real importance. It was impossible for anybody to secure that an apology, explanation, or contradiction in the shape of explanatory matter should go to the same people who had seen the original libel. It was utterly impossible that that could be secured in any case. If they could insure that all the persons who read the libel should also read the explanation, there might be some argument in favour of the clause, but it was impossible to say that a libel could be published without injury, even if there was an absence of malice. It was no reparation to receive an apology, explanation, or contradiction. It merely put an end to the period during which the unrettracted libel went out to the public. In his opinion it would be most unsafe to deviate from the principle that every apology should be accompanied by a payment into Court. That would secure to the libelled person some reparation, and would be a means, he ventured to think, of putting an end to a great deal of unnecessary litigation. If a man found that £5 or £10 were paid into Court he would get his costs, and decline to proceed further with the action. The sum of £5 was very little; but it frequently represented the difference between costs as between party and party and attorney and client. He failed to see why a man who was libelled should not, after vindicating his character by way of action, be pecuniarily in the same position as if he had not been libelled at all. The hon. and learned Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said the plaintiff in a libel case should not be in a position to say that the defendant had paid money into Court. But the reason he should be able to say that was obvious. If a man brought an action for injury done to him, it was very easy for him to prove that he had been libelled, but he did not see how the plaintiff in a libel case was to prove special damages. That was a thing he could not do, and he ventured to think that he ought not to be asked to do it. If the clause were allowed to stand in its present form, it would give what the Committee would never wish to give—namely, a practical immunity to libellers.

MR. ADDISON hoped the Committee would allow him to say a word in answer to the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Kelly). He thought that the illustration which had been given by his hon. and learned Friend was a very good illustration of the manner in which frivolous actions for libel were now brought. A newspaper by the merest accident inserted under the head of "Bankruptcy" a notice of liquidation, the words being used in some cases as synonymous terms. What might the gentleman who considered himself libelled have done? If he had gone to the editor, he would have been only too glad to have acknowledged the error, and to have put in an ample explanation of the mistake which would avoid any possibility of injury being inflicted. But, instead of doing so, an action for libel was brought, and now they were told that it was necessary to bring an action, because some persons might have read the paragraph and not have read the apology. They were told that the apology would not be read by the same people, but, if that were the case, would the trial be read any more than the apology. These actions were nearly always brought when the real injury would have been set right at once by the newspaper if it had been allowed to do so.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) said, they all knew that if they gave a libel a day's start, it would take a week to overtake it. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Addison) had given an illustration of a case in which the word "liquidation" was inserted instead of "dissolution." That appeared in a monthly trade journal, and it reminded him of a very important case which occurred to the proprietor of a weekly newspaper, and which he believed was familiar to most Members of that House. It was a case where a newspaper had employed a certain lady of title to act as scout in society, to bring any little matters of information and scandals, the lady being rewarded by the payment of some infinitesimal sum for doing so. In the particular case to which he referred, a young lady was maligned, and brought an action against the proprietor of a newspaper. The newspaper was severely fined, but the lady who committed the libel got off scot-free. He was desirous of making the Law of Libel perfect, and to insure that there was no loophole for letting off a newspaper who, by inserting a libel, had seriously injured the character of an individual. As a matter of fact, in many of those cases no money payment would set the injury right. If, however, the hon. and learned Attorney General would give him an assurance that Clause 5 would not in any way weaken the present Law of Libel, he would be very glad to agree to it.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, that, as he had been appealed to, he felt bound to say that the clause did weaken the Law of Libel, in the sense that the defendant would be able to get off the payment of damages or costs unless the plaintiff could prove special damages in any particular case.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 89; Noes 41: Majority 48.—(Div. List, No. 146.)

Clause 6 (Power to defendant to give certain evidence in mitigation of damages).

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport) said, he did not know whether the hon. Baronet (Sir Algernon Borthwick) proposed, in accordance with his Motion on the Paper, to move to strike out this clause.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) was understood to say that he did not propose to do so.

MR. JENNINGS said, he hoped the clause would be retained. It was one of the most important clauses in the Bill, its object being to prevent newspapers being subjected to black-mail by persons who brought actions for libel, very often one after another, for no real damage, but in order to make money out of newspapers not able to defend themselves. There were many respectable newspapers against whom an action for libel was absolutely ruinous. In most of these cases no real damage was done, and in many cases the newspaper proprietor would be glad to make a compromise by paying costs. It was not desired in the least to give any protection whatever to those who were really guilty of reckless libels, and the rights of all persons who were libelled were preserved under the Bill. All that the clause said was that it should be open to a newspaper to explain or to plead in mitigation of damages, that the plaintiff had already recovered damages or had received, or agreed to receive, compensation in respect of the libel to the same purport or effect as the libel for which the action was brought. That seemed to him to be a very reasonable provision indeed. No one was prepared to say that a newspaper proprietor should not pay damages to a person who had been libelled or injured by a libel, and the libelled person might bring as many actions as he chose. But the newspaper proprietor was to be at liberty to go into Court and plead that the plaintiff had already brought 20, 30, or 40 actions against different newspapers, and had recovered damages in each case for the same libel. It was further provided that that was a matter which should be considered by the jury in mitigation of damages, and that was the sole object of the clause. The Committee must not suppose that the actions for libel which were reported in the newspapers by any means included all the actions which the newspapers had to meet. There were cases in which newspapers paid money over and over again to persons who were no better than professional black-legs, rather than run the risk of going into Court and being cast in damages for the most frivolous of so-called injuries. This clause was intended, in point of fact, to protect respectable newspapers from blackmailers, and not to give greater facilities to libellous or reckless writers than were given at present. On the contrary, he thought the promoters of the Bill would deal more severely with libellous matter recklessly inserted in newspapers than any other hon. Members of the House. He hoped the Committee would not reject the clause without full consideration as to what it led to, and what it involved. He ventured to think that no one who looked closely into it would be of opinion that it did more than confer on respectable newspapers reasonable and adequate protection against injustice.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, he thought he might be considered something of an expert in this matter, for there was a time when he had been regularly libelled once a month, though he had not found that the process did him much harm. He must say that he was very much inclined to agree with the views of the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Jennings). It seemed to him that if they gave up this clause, the Bill would be so emasculated that it would not be worth having. The clause proposed to allow a defendant to take steps to prevent a plaintiff making money out of a libel by going about from one Court to another, and making a good thing of it. Surely that was a thing which no one, however he might object to the Bill, could wish to see allowed. Therefore, if the clause were carried to a Division, he should certainly support it.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) said, he did not concur in the view of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He thought that the Committee would admit that there were cases in which a plea of this kind would be most misleading. For instance, take the case of a paper in the Lake District. Why should that paper, if it had libelled a man, be benefited by an action brought against a Manchester paper which had also libelled him? The plaintiff might have brought an action and recovered damages in Manchester, but what those damages had to do with the amount of injury inflicted upon him by a libel published against him in the Lake District, he (Mr. Kelly) failed to perceive. The paper in the Lake District would not have to pay a farthing more on account of any injury inflicted by the Manchester paper. Of course, if a defendant got a friend to publish a libel against him, and then went about bringing actions against the newspapers in which it appeared, he could understand the force of the observations of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings) about black-mail, but such things did not happen. But these newspapers were published for the profit of the persons who published them. Sometimes the insertion of a scandalous libel increased the sale of a paper, and it was ridiculous to say that because the person libelled claimed a proper amount of compensation for the wrong which had been done, it should be characterized as an attempt to levy black-mail. He trusted the Committee would accept the clause. [A laugh.] He saw that hon. Gentlemen connected with newspapers were prepared to take advantage of any slip, and he could not imagine how they should then object to the other people taking advantage of the slips calculated to do immense injury made in newspapers. He trusted the Committee would reject the clause, because it would mislead juries, and induce them to take into consideration matters with which they had nothing to do.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) said, that, as one of the promoters of the Bill, he must object to the course taken by his hon. Friend opposite (Sir Algernon Borthwick) in regard to this clause. He thought they were bound to arrest the eviscerating process which had been going on with regard to the Bill. The remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman were altogether inapplicable to the clause, because the jury were not forced to be influenced by the fact that a plaintiff had received compensation already for the same libel, and the clause, at it stood, would not necessarily affect the interesting friend of the hon. and learned Member who lived in the Lake District. It must be borne in mind that this was not a compulsory but a permissive clause. It was directed against professional litigants, and those unscrupulous solicitors who put in action groups of libel cases on the bare chance of obtaining costs for correspondence. He knew of several papers which had three or four cases of that kind pending against them; and what was their position? They found it necessary to pay heavy sums of money in order to escape the inconvenience and expense of a law suit, because they knew that if they went into Court and succeeded in getting a verdict, their opponents were men of straw, from whom they could recover nothing whatever. Under those circumstances, he thought the Committee would be of opinion that this important clause should be retained in the Bill. He might instance a case which occurred about three months ago, where a solicitor brought an action against 42 papers for stating that he had been struck off the Rolls. Another solicitor of the same name was struck off the Rolls, but an official of the Court made a mistake, and gave the reporter for the news agency the address of the solicitor who brought the action, and who happened himself to be a bankrupt. He claimed £2,000 in each case, or £84,000 in all.

MR. KELLY asked, whether any of those actions were ever tried?

MR. LAWSON said, he did not see how that mattered in the least. He was only giving the case as an example to show what the professional litigants could do. This was the way in which newspapers were black-mailed under the licence given to professional litigants and unscrupulous solicitors. He sincerely hoped the Committee would allow the clause to be retained in the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, he wished to point out one matter to the Committee. He had already opposed the last clause—that the plaintiff should not be entitled to claim compensation at all, assuming that there had been no negligence and no malice, unless he proved special damage. Therefore, it would now be necessary for a man who had been libelled to prove that he had sustained special damage by the publication of the libel. Therefore, if a libel were published in The Manchester Guardian, for instance, the plaintiff would have to prove that he had lost a portion of his Manchester custom; but what right had the defendant to give evidence of damages having been recovered upon a similar libel in another part of England? He certainly could not assent to the present clause, now that they had passed the 5th clause. It involved a most serious alteration of the law. The hon. Gentleman below the Gangway who had just spoken (Mr. Lawson) was careful to argue the clause in regard to its effect upon the black-mailer; but as the clause was framed it would apply equally to the honest plaintiff who might have been grossly libelled.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: A person might be libelled, and grossly libelled, by a newspaper. He was ready to admit that the managers of newspapers, as a rule, carried on their business without wishing to publish libels, although there were undoubtedly some who did not pursue that course, but were in the habit of indulging in libels. There were very many respectable newspapers which never inserted libellous matter. He failed to see why a man who suffered special damage from a publication in a newspaper circulated in a particular county should not recover those damages, and why it should be given in evidence that damages had been obtained in respect of that libel to the same purport or effect. It seemed to him that the clause went much too far, and he should feel compelled to vote against it.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, that the point raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was an important one. No doubt, in the case of a newspaper published in Westmoreland and another in Cornwall, there would be such a distance between them that the argument against giving evidence in regard to damages recovered in another action might apply. But take the case of London. A series of London newspapers might contain the same libel, and a plaintiff would be able to bring numerous actions which were practically one and the same. Therefore, it seemed to him to be only right that the whole of the facts should be placed before the jury, and all that was asked to be done by the clause was that the defendants should have liberty to give evidence to the jury to satisfy them what the extent of the injury had been. That being ascertained, it would rest with the jury to assess the damages, and they would be in full possession of the facts. Therefore, the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General did not apply in such cases at all. The whole of the facts of the case would be placed before the jury before they came to a conclusion upon the subject. The hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) had spoken of the actions brought against 42 newspapers for the same libel. In that case, in which it happened that he was professionally engaged for most of the papers, the libel was one over which the newspaper editor had no control whatever. In fact, the error originated with one of the officials of the Courts. A certain solicitor was struck off the Rolls, and a reporter for a news agency asked an usher who the solicitor referred to was. The usher referred to the official Court Law List and gave the name of a man which was identical with that of the solicitor struck off, but who turned out to be the wrong one. Instead of 42, there were from 60 to 80 actions brought, and the total claim amounted to about £160,000. It was quite true that those actions were not tried; but large sums of money were paid into Court, inasmuch as there could be no disclaimer on the part of the newspaper proprietors that the paragraph was a libel, and settlements were made which were altogether excessive, and beyond any real injury sustained. The actions were not tried on account of the death of the plaintiff. All the newspaper proprietors wished that in such a case, in future, the defendants should not be placed at a disadvantage by not being able to place the whole of the circumstances as to damages and settlements before the jury who would be called upon to decide the case.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, he had had no intention of taking part in the debate in Committee on that Bill; but he thought it was of the utmost importance that they should have fair and reasonable laws with regard to libels, and they ought to bear in mind those newspapers which were anxious to do what was fair and right towards the general public. When he read the clause he certainly thought it was a fair and reasonable one, and he would ask his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, or the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, whether there were any words in the clause which ought to be omitted, or anything that could be inserted to amend it, so as to secure that every person who was attacked by the Press should have a fair and impartial hearing, and to prevent as far as possible those persons whose only object was to make large sums of money out of the Press in connection with libel cases that were never intentionally committed. Unless he heard stronger objections than had yet been urged, he should feel bound in the interests of the Press to vote for the clause.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, his hon. Friend the Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) had mentioned a case in which more than 40 actions were brought for the same libel. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) asked if they were tried. Probably he was not aware of the difficulty which arose in regard to getting them tried, the fact being that a sort of punishment fell upon the person who brought them, and he died before the actions could come on. As a matter of fact, it often happened that cases of that kind were not tried because the man who brought them went round to the different newspapers. The newspaper proprietor had to put in a justification, but he saw that by the present law he must lose the action; and, in order to avoid further loss to himself, he agreed to pay a sum of money to the person who brought the action. In that way there was a perfect and persistent system of blackmailing now going on. The hon. and learned Attorney General rested his objection to the clause, as far as he could gather, on the fact that Clause 5 had been carried.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: Not entirely.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Not entirely?

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: No; only partly.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The hon. and learned Gentleman rested his objection to this clause upon the fact that the 5th clause had been carried. He did not, however, rest it entirely; only partly—probably very much partly. The hon. and learned Attorney General had opposed the 5th clause. He did not approve of it, and therefore opposed it.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, the hon. Gentleman was in error, but he had no wish to interrupt him. He did not vote against the 5th clause. He objected to the clause as it stood, but he proposed to amend it on the Report.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he wished to know whether, before the discussion took place in the House, the hon. and learned Gentleman did not intimate to the promoters of the Bill that he would not agree to the Bill being supported by the Government unless they consented to omit the 5th and 6th clause? It was against that decision that he entirely protested, and he wished to know whether it was a fact that an intimation was given that Clauses 5 and 6 would be opposed by the Government? Was he to understand that the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Kensington (Sir Algernon Borthwick) really believed himself that those clauses ought to be eliminated from the Bill? If not, why did he move that they should be eliminated?

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK said, he wished to explain that the hon. and learned Attorney General had been kind enough to point out certain defects in the Bill, and in consequence of the hon. and learned Gentleman's observations he took the course which he had adopted. With regard to the present clause he should vote for it.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, he had made no arrangement with the hon. Gentleman below the Gangway, but he had intimated that he intended to endeavour to amend the clause.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked, if he was to understand absolutely that there was no sort of arrangement in regard to any clause of the Bill, and that the hon. Baronet the Member for South Kensington, in his Motion to leave out certain clauses, merely acted according to his own view of those clauses? Had he taken the initiative in moving the rejection of this clause from his own belief that the clause was bad?

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK said, he distinctly approved of the 6th clause, and should vote for it.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then what was this entry upon the Votes? Could his eyes deceive him? "Sir Algernon Borthwick"—he presumed Sir Algernon Borthwick was Member for South Kensington—"to leave out Clause 6."

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK: You may be permitted to change your mind.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that no doubt the Committee would always be glad to receive back a repentant sinner, but he must say that the course adopted by the hon. Baronet was a very singular one. The Bill passed the second reading as it stood in its entirety. No intimation was made then that the promoters intended to alter the Bill in any sort of way. But what did he find now? That one of the best clauses was moved to be omitted by the promoters of the Bill. He could not help supposing that there must have been some sort of communication with the Government, seeing that the hon. Baronet was a supporter of the Government, or the Bill would not have been emasculated in this way by the promoters themselves. It appeared now that the hon. Baronet saw reason to change his mind, and was in favour of the clause. He (Mr. Labouchere) was exceedingly glad to hear it, and he was sure the intimation would induce many hon. Members to follow him rather than the hon. and learned Member for North Camberwell. The hon. and learned Member for North Camberwell came forward as a lawyer, and not as one of the public. He seemed to imagine that he ought to get up there on every occasion as the advocate of the people against newspapers. Now, the newspapers did not desire to have any exceptional law in their favour, but all they wanted was justice. There were certain Members in that House who, like the hon. and learned Member for North Camberwell, seemed to think that a newspaper proprietor or editor was to be treated like a stoat or a weasel, or some other animal feræ naturæ, and that they were not to have the benefit of the same law that was dealt out to other people. He trusted that that fact would be thoroughly remembered by hon. Members when the vote was taken. The clause simply said that a newspaper might submit to the jury the fact that damages, special or otherwise, in an important case had been already given to the plaintiff, who had thus received a solatium for his wounded honour, feelings, or interest. That was all the jury would consider—whether a man, having been injured, had received a sufficient solatium. It was directed against a system of blackmailing by which a man was unable to obtain more than a sufficient solatium.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK said, he wished to explain that in the course he had pursued in reference to this matter he had not been acting by himself, nor in any arbitrary fashion. He had felt bound to consult those who were concerned with him in promoting the Bill, and the course he had taken had been guided by the advice he had received.

Mr. Labouchere

MR. KELLY said, he had only one word to say as to the course he had pursued in reference to this clause. He had all along opposed the clause, and he had placed an Amendment on the Paper for its omission. He thought the House was under a little misapprehension with regard to the effect of the clause. The Committee had heard of a case which had led to a large number of actions. Now, he had reported that case himself, but he did not libel the gentleman in question. The hon. Member for South Islington (Sir Albert Rollit) said there had been no negligence in that case, because the person who made the false report got his information from the usher of the Court. Now, he should have thought that a person who was content to obtain information of that kind from the usher of the Court was certainly guilty of the grossest negligence. He would tell the hon. Member how the mistake arose. An application was made to strike off the Roll of Attorneys a person whom he would now call John Smith, and who had carried on business at Liverpool. There was only one John Smith on The Law List, and he practised in Salters' Hall Court, London. The reporter, instead of leaving out the address as to where the man carried on his business, asked for information from the usher, who handed him The Law List. Finding a John Smith there, the reporter inserted the name as that of the man who was struck off the Rolls. The mistake arose from the ignorance or carelessness of the reporter, who ought to have known that most frequently men whom it was sought to strike off the rolls did not take out certificates, and that, consequently, their names did not appear in The Law List. In his (Mr. Kelly's) opinion, that was just the one case of all others in which damages ought to be given against a newspaper proprietor for employing an incompetent, ignorant, and careless reporter, who might have done the greatest possible injury to a respectable practitioner.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE said, he intended to support the clause, but he did not think there was much advantage to be derived from discussing it in reference to individual cases. He thought the clause was an extremely valuable part of the Bill, though certainly what it proposed to do directly could now be done indirectly in every case of libel. It only provided that all the facts should be laid before the jury when an action for libel was brought against a newspaper proprietor. If it were calculated injuriously to affect the interests of a person who had been libelled, he should certainly vote against it; but it only proposed to do what was done in reality in every action already. No doubt, the defendant could not bring forward evidence of previous actions taken by the plaintiff; but he could cross-examine the plaintiff, and in that way do so. But, as a rule, the learned Judge told the jury that evidence thus obtained ought to have no effect or influence upon their minds. What was now done indirectly this clause proposed to do in future directly; so that instead of the jury being told by the learned Judge that they were not to take this fact into consideration in assessing damages, he might inform them that, if they were so pleased, they might do so. The hon. and learned Attorney General had argued the question as if Clause 5, which they had just agreed to, would remain as it stood; but it had been agreed to on the understanding that it should be amended on the Report. The effect of the clause under consideration would be to prevent plaintiffs from multiplying actions, and as he regarded that as a valuable part of the Bill he should vote for it.

SIR JOHN SIMON (Dewsbury) said, he believed that the clause was practically just and fair, and should be sorry to see it struck out of the Bill. The object of the Law of Libel was to enable a man, if libelled, to vindicate his character; and if he brought an action and succeeded in vindicating his character, what more could he require, or what more should he obtain? If he recovered damages in one action, that was all that he was entitled to, and all that the law ought to allow him. The hon. and learned Member for West Newington (Mr. Radcliffe Cooke) had pointed out the uncertain condition in which the law stood—namely, that although there was no direct law to entitle a man to give evidence as to other actions brought against newspapers, yet he was indirectly enabled to obtain that evidence, because if the plaintiff had given his evidence he might be cross-examined as to whether he had brought actions before, although Counsel or the Judge would be justified in telling the jury that they ought not to take that fact into consideration in assessing damages. He thought that was a most unsatisfactory and unfair state of the law. Honourable men would not bring a multiplicity of actions; but it would open the door to men of another stamp, who would seek to make money out of an accidental publication or an indiscretion that might have been committed. It was said that a newspaper proprietor should be punished for employing an incompetent or negligent servant. Well, he thought that what all employers did was to try to get the best men to serve them that they could, and if they failed to do so in some cases, it was their misfortune and not their fault, and they ought to be visited with punishment in consequence. He would be the last person to seek to exempt newspapers from responsibility in regard to what they published; but, on the other hand, he was not prepared to become a party to doing anything which would facilitate the levying of blackmail, or subjecting them to being victimized by any person of questionable antecedents who might choose to take advantage of an accidental slip on the part of a newspaper proprietor. He thought the clause was a very fair one.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) said, the Committee must bear in mind that this clause was only to put an end to a barbarous technical rule which no one would ever think of incorporating in the law in the present day if these rules were now being considered for the first time. The rule was that evidence was not admissible that a man had already cleared his character elsewhere, and had obtained damages against some other newspaper. Though a man might have been already in the box and submitted to cross-examination, and though the facts of the case might have been proved by other evidence, all declarations to that effect were technically inadmissible according to this barbarous rule. A man was not allowed to show that the plaintiff had brought other actions and had obtained certain damages. He asked the Committee to put an end to that technical and barbarous rule.

Clause 7 (Defendant may in certain cases obtain security for costs).

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) said, he begged to move that this clause be omitted. The reason for his Motion was this—that although the clause was an excellent one in itself and of great value, nevertheless he admitted that it would be exceptional, and, therefore, perhaps unfair. He wished to see the clause in some way or other become the law of the land; but he quite admitted that it would be invidious to give to the Press a privilege which was not possessed by railway and other companies in actions for damages, and for that reason he begged leave to withdraw the section.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had, unintentionally no doubt, just now attempted to put him (the Attorney General) into an altogether false position. In the first speech he (Sir Richard Webster) had made in Committee on this Bill, he had stated that he simply spoke on the measure for himself, and not on behalf of the Government. He had stated that distinctly, and he had further stated that he had been asked by the hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill to point out what he considered were the objections to be taken to it, and that the hon. Baronet had adopted Amendments that would meet those objections so far as he (Sir Richard Webster) was personally concerned. That was the state of the case—there was no pledge of any kind. The hon. Baronet had, on the occasion to which he referred, adopted the course he had taken that day—namely, that although he had moved an Amendment, it had only been in order to get the expression of the Committee upon it, he himself voting against it. As to the clause, might he (Sir Richard Webster) point out two or three reasons why it seemed to him impossible to accept it? It was not suggested that newspaper editors and proprietors did not carry on their business on commercial principles, and some of them very successfully. This clause would give them immunity against plaintiffs not able to pay costs; but it must be obvious to everyone that newspaper proprietors and editors were not the only persons against whom these actions were brought. Actions were frequently brought against employers for negligence, for which, as a matter of fact, they had no moral, and very little legal responsibility, and then they had to fight the cases with no chance of getting a fraction of their own costs. There were a great many cases, no doubt, which should not be taken up against newspaper proprietors; but, on principle, it would not be fair to give a special privilege to that class of defendants, although it might be true that, as a rule, they conducted their newspapers very carefully and well. Then, again, it would be unfair to prevent a plaintiff, who might be a poor man, from bringing an action. The character of such a man might be seriously impugned by a libel, and yet, if he brought an action in order to obtain satisfaction and rehabilitate himself in the opinion of his neighbours, the newspaper proprietor might be able to stop him by showing that he was not able to pay the costs. Newspapers, it might be, ran extra risk; but he (Sir Richard Webster) looked upon the clause as wrong in principle, and, therefore, should oppose it.

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport) said, that he, no doubt like others whose names were on the back of the Bill, heard, with great regret, that this clause was to be withdrawn by the chief promoter. He must say that the treatment received by those who had put their names on the back of the Bill, from the persons who had induced them to take that position, was very extraordinary. They had heard a great deal about the clause being withdrawn by the chief promoter after consultation with the other promoters; but he (Mr. Jennings), as one whose name was on the back of the Bill, must declare that no consultation had ever taken place with him. He confessed that it was with the utmost dismay that he had heard that the hon. Baronet had determined upon killing his own child; and now, not content with that, the hon. Baronet attempted to throw the blame upon his fellow promoters, who were entirely innocent of the crime. He (Mr. Jennings) looked upon this clause as a very material part of the Bill, and there was but one objection to the working of it. That objection was that a really poor and honest plaintiff in a suit might be debarred from bringing an action by its being shown that he could not pay the costs, or might be subjected to hardship of some sort. He thought every effort should be made to meet such cases, and that nothing should be allowed to prevent a person with a real cause of complaint from bringing an action against a newspaper proprietor, in order to defend his character. It seemed to him (Mr. Jennings) that an Amendment in some such form as this, "unless just cause to the contrary be shown," should be inserted. He thought those words would be sufficient; but if they were not enough, and if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General desired to do a service to the promoters of the Bill, he would introduce words in order to make the clause as strong as possible, so as to enable a poor and honest man to bring an action against a newspaper which had libelled him, without being obliged to show, in the first instance, that he was in a position to pay the costs. What this clause sought to do was to prevent adventurers and blackmailers who brought actions for libel against newspapers under frivolous pretexts being allowed to go on unless they could show that, in the event of the verdict going against them, they could pay the costs. This would operate very materially against what had become practically a systematic business on the part of many dishonest persons who brought actions against newspapers, and then got them settled quietly by the payment of a certain amount of money and costs. They had been told more than once that most newspaper writers were libellers, and deliberately traduced people's characters. Well, that was not true. It was quite as unfair to say so as it would be to say that all lawyers lived upon these spurious actions for libel. There were, however, many lawyers who did live upon them—there were many lawyers in this City who would prefer to bring an action for libel to going on with any other class of business, as they knew that, in the event of their being successful, they would be able to get their costs from the newspaper proprietors, and that, in all probability, the paper before the case had proceeded very far would say—"Take £50 or £60, and let the matter drop." Over and over again it had happened that respectable newspapers had, for bond fide purposes, published news which reflected upon the characters of individuals, and had actions brought against them by plaintiffs who simply wanted to make a profit out of the matter, and were not in a position to pay their costs if unsuccessful. A shameful case of this kind occurred, in which The Daily Telegraph, through publishing a notice concerning a certain criminal, had to pay a large amount of costs, he believed some £700. This sort of thing frequently happened to newspapers, who said nothing at all about it; the facts, therefore, never came to the knowledge of the public, and these actions were absolutely ruinous to a class of small newspapers—Provincial papers, which did great service to the public, and service of which certain lawyers were very glad to avail themselves, especially when they were fighting contested elections. They did not find these gentlemen running down such newspapers then. These papers were frequently threatened with actions for libel, and in order to settle them and save the expense they were very often induced to pay a sum of money and the lawyers' costs—the lawyers' costs, he need not say, being frequently the largest part of the bill. It was to put an end to such a state of things as that that this clause had been drawn up. He could not, however, express too strongly his hope that the clause might be placed in such a shape that a poor man who had suffered libel at the hands of a newspaper should be able to obtain protection, even if he was not able to give security for the payment of costs. He hoped that the clause would be carried, and that a stop would be put to the career of disreputable adventurers who went about plundering newspapers by the aid of more or less disreputable lawyers.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, that this subject might be dealt with in a separate Bill; and if the hon. Baronet (Sir Algernon Borthwick) would bring in a measure dealing generally with the law, and requiring that, under certain circumstances, plaintiffs who might be men of straw should give security for costs, he should be happy to support such a proposal. He could speak from his own professional experience in regard to that matter. It was impossible to exaggerate the amount of blackmailing which went on against newspaper proprietors. There were hundreds of actions brought in which the plaintiffs were men of straw, and in which there was not the faintest chance of their paying the costs; in fact, they never meant to pay them, however the cases went, and, in fact, never did pay them when they lost. In those cases the costs of the defendants were very much more severe than would have been any amount of damages the jury would have been likely to inflict had the cases gone against the newspapers. But newspaper proprietors were not the only victims in cases of this kind. Employers of labour, railway companies and masters also suffered. Very frequently an employer of labour was only too happy to buy off an employé who threatened him with an action. He (Mr. Osborne Morgan) thought it would not be advisable to pass a special law which did not apply to defendants generally, but only to newspaper proprietors; and, therefore, he thought the hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill had exercised a wise discretion in determining to withdraw the clause.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) said, the Committee seemed to be discussing this question under a misapprehension, hon. Gentlemen speaking as though the law laid down in the clause applied only to newspapers. As a matter of fact, it applied to everybody; and though he desired to support the objects of the promoters of the Bill so far as those objects could be gathered, still it was quite clear from the speech of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings)—one of the ablest of the supporters of the Bill, who threw himself vigorously into the debate, flushed with his victory of the previous day—that the clause was so framed that even he himself would be utterly unable to vote for it in its present form. The hon. Member told them that the clause, as it stood, would prevent a poor man who had been genuinely libelled from bringing an action. ["No, no!"] Well, he (Mr. Cooke) had understood the hon. Member in that sense. Not only had the hon. Member said that, but he had urged the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to put in words in order to prevent a poor man, who could not show his ability to pay costs, from being precluded from bringing an action against a newspaper which had libelled him.

MR. JENNINGS said, that what he had intended to convey was that he thought the words now in the clause would accomplish this object, and that, if they did not, he trusted that some stronger words would be inserted.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE said, that those words certainly did not carry out that object. If the hon. Member had thought that the words in the clause would accomplish the object in question, why was he so earnest in entreating the Attorney General to put in words to effect it? One main reason why, although he desired to support the Bill in the main, he could not support this clause was that the objects of the clause were practically carried out by the law as it stood. Under Section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867, it was insisted that it should be lawful for any person against whom an action—and the section named the actions, amongst them being libel and slander—should be brought to make an affidavit that the plaintiff had no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant, should a verdict not be found for the plaintiff; and thereupon the Judge should have power to make an order that the plaintiff should give full security for costs, or that the action should be remitted to the County Court, where the costs would be very much less. The difficulty, therefore, was met, to a large extent, by the existing law; and for that reason, and because the promoters of the Bill themselves admitted that the clause, as drawn, did not provide against a great danger, he (Mr. Cooke) found himself unable to vote for it.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) said, the clause was another of those directed against disreputable plaintiffs whose cases were conducted by equally disreputable attorneys. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings) that it was most desirable, if legal ingenuity could do it, to guard against the possibility of the clause being used against a genuine but poor litigant. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had already assisted the promoters by suggesting several Amendments; and he (Mr.

Mr. Osborne Morgan

Lawson) would, therefore, ask the hon. and learned Gentleman if he could not, on the point they were dealing with, suggest an Amendment which would render the clause harmless in the particular case to which attention had been called?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, he had considered that point, and it seemed to him that no Amendment of the kind ought properly to be proposed, as the principle of the clause was bad altogether. He objected to the provision altogether, and thought it should be struck out. In the case of a man who had been adjudicated a bankrupt, obviously the Judge could not expect him to find security for the payment of costs; and, under such circumstances, a newspaper would be able to libel a man with impunity. The whole scope of the clause was to prevent persons from bringing actions who were not in a position to pay costs, and that would be obviously unfair to many injured persons who happened to be poor.

MR. LAWSON said, why not, after the words "adjudicated bankrupt," insert words to limit the application of the clause to such individuals? That would be a satisfactory modification. He wished to remind the Committee that in dealing with this matter they should recollect the way they treated Clause 4. They omitted all those words in Clause 4 which related to the publication of notices issued for the information of the public by order of any Government Office or Department. Well, if the Committee would permit him, he would like to refer to one specific case which had already been mentioned to show how a newspaper could be prosecuted by a bogus litigant if those words were left out which the Attorney General himself had proposed, or assented to, or recommended. In the case mentioned by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Jennings) an official letter came to a London newspaper from the Assistant Commissioner of Police, asking that newspaper to insert a particular paragraph warning the public that a great fraud was being carried out by an ex-convict named Murray, assisted by another well-known ex-convict named Benson. This was a fraud not only being contemplated, but on the point of being carried out to the great injury of the public. Well, the paragraph received from the Assistant Commissioner of Police was inserted in this newspaper, and next morning a letter of thanks was received from him for the publication of the paragraph, and giving additional particulars, which he asked might also appear. These additional particulars were also published, and the fraud was stopped. In consequence of the publication of this information, society was prevented from being victimised by the swindlers in question, and the newspaper received the thanks of the Assistant Commissioner of Police for what it had done. Well, in consequence of that official paragraph appearing in the newspaper, the man Murray brought an action against the paper, which was put to the expense of some £700, principally in making inquiries in Geneva and elsewhere into the matter, and received very little assistance from the Police. He need not say that the action had failed when brought into Court; but still, the newspaper was put to this great expense, and all because it trusted to the accuracy of a communication received from an official department. The facts contained in the paragraph which formed the subject matter of the libel were true, as it turned out, but as there was no possibility of recovering costs from the plaintiff, who was a man of straw and a bankrupt, it was very little use to the newspaper to prove that it was in the right. What he wished to say was this—that a newspaper might be anxious to assist the Government in matters of this kind as much as possible, but was frequently precluded from taking the action, as in the case to which he had referred, on account of the risks thereby incurred. Supposing this clause were not pressed, would the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General give them any reason to hope that Clause 4, which was omitted in Committee on a former occasion, would be put back on the Report stage so safeguarded that the dangers which were foreseen would be effectually prevented?

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, it seemed to him that for once the hon. Gentleman the Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) had lost the real point of the reason why Clause 4 was struck out. The case the hon. Member had cited was hardly in point, but he must say at once that if the hon.

Gentleman could suggest on Report any clause which would meet such cases as that to which he had referred, he (Sir Richard Webster) would gladly consider it, though he could not give any pledge on the matter. The words referred to had been struck out because it was not thought desirable to make a newspaper privileged in the case of information received from even a Government office, but the point now under discussion was different. If a police official sent to a respectable newspaper certain information with the request that it should be published, the newspaper proprietor publishing such information with his eyes open would have no right to shelter himself under the authority of that public department. Whatever he published he would publish at his own risk. What he (Sir Richard Webster) wanted to point out was, that because in a particular case a newspaper might think it worth while to act upon instructions received in a perfectly bona fide way from a public department, it was no reason why that newspaper should enjoy immunity from an action for libel. As he had said, however, the point under discussion was a different one and was not touched by that other consideration. The point was whether all individuals, it might be the servants of an employer, were not to be entitled to obtain redress for injury inflicted upon them in the way of libel or slander unless they could give security for costs. In many instances men who were unjustly libelled may have lost the whole of their money directly in consequence of that libel, or through the necessity of clearing their character, and then their only chance of reinstating themselves might be by bringing an action for libel, and if this clause were adhered to such a course might be rendered impossible.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) said, he desired to say a few words on the clause under discussion, as he considered it impossible that it could be allowed to stand. This question of security for costs was a very serious one indeed. The evil with which the clause sought to deal, was one that rich people must be content to put up with, because it could not be remedied without serious damage to the poor. There were cases, however, in which some such law as this, he thought, ought to be adopted, and he would suggest that a clause should be drawn up to deal with the worst of all cases—namely, that in which a long series of actions was brought in respect of the same libel, and which would provide that where actions were brought against several newspapers in respect of the same libel, the proceedings in the second and subsequent actions should be stayed until the first had been tried or security for costs for the others was given. They might allow a man to bring one action, but if he failed in that, the others should be dismissed. He would thus be prevented from putting a whole series of newspapers to the expense of defending actions without giving security for the payment of their costs if unsuccessful. That would be some protection in regard to the worst cases with which the newspaper proprietors would have to deal. While he was anxious to see protection given to the newspaper proprietors he would ask that body to consider whether there were not other large sections of the community who suffered a great deal more than they did from being unable to obtain security for costs. He did not wish to go into the matter very fully, but merely desired to point out that if protection was given it should not be given to libellers only.

SIR JOHN SIMON (Dewsbury) said, that the objectionable part of the clause consisted of the words "that the plaintiff has been adjudicated a bankrupt or." Why should a man be libelled with impunity because he had been adjudicated a bankrupt? He thought that if those words were omitted there would be ample protection for the poor man. The words which would govern the section would then be, "has no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant should a verdict not be found for the plaintiff," and the Judge under those words would have an opportunity of listening to any circumstances which would justify the action prima facie. In that way a poor man would not be injured or deprived of his right to redress. If they went to a Division on the question to omit the words, "that the plaintiff has been adjudicated a bankrupt or," he (Sir John Simon) should support the proposal. The matter, however, seemed to him to require grave consideration, and it would, perhaps, be as well for the hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill to withdraw the clause in order to bring up a new one on a later occasion.

MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) said, he thought the clause should be remodelled. It could not stand in its present form, because it would prevent a poor man from bringing an action against a wealthy newspaper. In certain localities at election time there was often a race between the Conservative and Radical papers as to who should be the first to libel people taking a prominent part in politics. He knew perfectly well, in the neighbourhood that he was acquainted with, that there were many persons rendered miserable and unhappy by the libellous statements made in certain newspapers; but their circumstances were so poor that they were unable to bring actions against those newspapers. He thought that every facility should be given in this new Libel Law Amendment Bill to poor men to resist the libellous attacks of newspapers. It was a well-known fact that there were wholesale libellers as well as blackmailers—that there was a certain class of papers that actually lived upon libelling unoffending persons. They sought for libels, and even courted actions for libel. He was acquainted with a newspaper, which boasted of a very large circulation, which made this statement to a solicitor—"We should be very glad indeed if you would bring an action for libel against us, as that is the very best advertisement we could have." He should certainly not support the clause unless it were remodelled, and, if it were remodelled, he hoped it would be in favour of the poor man.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, his name was on the back of the Bill, and he gave it a hearty support; but he must say that there was some ground for seeking to be especially prudent as to this clause. In remedying an evil which affected newspaper proprietors at large, and which also touched a large number of other persons, they must be careful not to create an exceptional privilege which would tell against the ultimate success of the Bill when it came before the House for third reading, or in "another place." He did not think the clause under discussion should pass in its present form, and the question was, Could it be modified? He felt great diffidence in following the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, who had pointed out the great difficulty existing in the matter; but he (Sir Albert Rollit) thought that words might be inserted which would place the law under this Bill in analogy with the existing law, and give it that generality which it did not in the clause seem to possess. He would suggest that the clause should be amended, so as to enable the Judge to allow an action to proceed, whether or not the plaintiff could show that he had means to pay the costs of the defendant, if he (the Judge) should be of opinion that there was a good cause of action on the merits. In this way, the Judge would have an opportunity of considering—first, whether the plaintiff had the means of paying the defendant's costs; and, secondly, whether there was a good cause of action on the merits. If the Judge thought that there was not a good cause of action on the merits, in pursuance of the principle recognized in the existing law, he might say—"If you wish to bring this action, you must give security that you are in a position to pay the costs if the verdict is against you." He (Sir Albert Rollit) thought that if these words were adopted they would, in a large number of cases, remove the objections which had been stated to the clause.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, he really thought the House had a right to complain of the system adopted in taking the Committee stage of this Bill. The hon. Member for South Kensington (Sir Algernon Borthwick) brought in the Bill with this clause in it, and a very important clause it was. The Bill was at first blocked; the blocks were afterwards taken off by those who had looked into the measure, and had come to the conclusion that they could allow it to be proceeded with. Well, he always thought the House had a right, when it was intended by the promoters of a Bill to make such an important alteration in it as to strike out one of its principal clauses, to be notified before the measure passed the second reading; otherwise, the Bill passed under false pretences—if he might say so—and he did not wish to use the words in any offensive sense. They had heard a great many legal Gentlemen speak upon this matter, and, as was usual, they knew less now what the law was than if those hon. Gentlemen had held their tongues. He should like to know exactly what the law was at the present moment with regard to plaintiffs who might be poor persons? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was not in the House, but he saw another eminent lawyer on the Front Bench opposite—namely, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and probably he would enlighten the Committee on the subject. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) had pointed out that in an action for tort before a Superior Court the Judge might, on application, remit the action to the County Court, or insist that the plaintiff should give security for costs. Was that the law at present? [Cries of "Yes!"] Then what was the complaint against the clause? The clause would only give practical effect in the case of actions for libel to the existing law. Hon. Gentlemen said that this was an attack upon the poor man, and that a poor man ought not to be libelled with impunity. ["No, no!"] Yes; the hon. Gentleman behind him said so, and he should go with his hon. Friend if he thought with him, but he (Mr. Labouchere) denied that the clause would press with undue severity upon the poor man. ["Read the clause!"] An hon. Gentleman said, "Read the clause." He would suggest to the hon. Member that he should read it himself, because he evidently had not done so, or, at all events, had not understood it, as he seemed to think that this clause was an attack upon the poor man. What did it say? Why, that the Judge, when a defendant first put in an affidavit that the plaintiff had no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant should a verdict not be found for the plaintiff, unless just cause to the contrary were shown, should make an order that the plaintiff should, within a time specified, give full security for the defendant's costs to the satisfaction of one of the Masters of the Court. Hon. Gentlemen opposite suggested that alterations should be made in the clause in order to safeguard the interests of the poor man, but the hon. and learned Attorney General had said he did not see how it could be done, and he (Mr. Labouchere) confessed he was surprised to hear that, because it seemed to him that it would be as easy as possible to make those alterations. In the first place, they might leave out the words "has been adjudicated a bankrupt, or has no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant," and so on, &c., and they might then introduce in line 7 the words "shall have power to make an order" that the plaintiff should within a time specified give full security for the defendant's costs. The effect of the clause would then be to require the Judge to look into the matter, and decide himself whether there was a fair and legitimate case for the poor man to bring an action, or whether it was a case of blackmail and there was really no reason for bringing an action. The assumption might be, if a man had "no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant," that the action was a speculative one brought by a solicitor, because if the plaintiff had no visible means of paying the defendant's costs if he lost, one might reasonably suppose that he had no visible means of paying his own solicitor if he won, unless he got something from the defendant. The Judge would, therefore, as the practically responsible person, look into the matter, and if he thought the case was in its nature not a reasonable one he would insist upon security being given for costs, but in no case would he do it when he had reason to think that it would tell unfairly against a poor man. They had had instances of hardship quoted during this discussion, and so far as he was concerned he need not go beyond his own experience for such instances. He had been much persecuted in this matter, and he would tell the House what had occurred to him. He only spoke of himself, because he was familiar with the details of the case in question, but he had no doubt that similar circumstances had occurred to other people. There was the case of a man who brought an action against an individual who had inserted something in a newspaper which he (Mr. Labouchere) was connected with. This plaintiff brought an action and lost it, and costs were given against him, but he did not pay those costs. He was a man living in an hotel in London. He was not domiciled in England, and they would not often be able to get security for payment of costs from a man who was not domiciled in England, although if one could show that he was living at an hotel there would be reason to think that the costs would be paid—and in this matter he (Mr. Labouchere) might say that he knew as much as the lawyers, having had to interest himself very largely in these matters. Well, this man brought his action against this individual and lost it, and was ordered to pay the defendant's costs. Well, in reality, he (Mr. Labouchere) was responsible for the alleged libel, and he had practically put himself into the position of the individual who had inserted the information in the paper. He (Mr. Labouchere) had to pay the costs. This person brought another action against him (Mr. Labouchere) not having paid his own costs, and he (Mr. Labouchere) had to employ eminent lawyers—one was obliged to have eminent lawyers, although they were very expensive luxuries—and on a particular day, after a number of interlocutory motions had been made, they went into Court to defend him. An affidavit was then put in by the plaintiff declaring that he was ill and not able to attend, and the case was put off for some weeks. He (Mr. Labouchere) had to pay the expense caused by this delay, and again they went into Court. The plaintiff on that occasion did not appear at all, and he (Mr. Labouchere) had to pay his own costs. He had to pay the costs of practically three actions, owing to the course pursued by this plaintiff, who never for a moment had intended to have the case tried, but had been simply actuated by a nasty, disagreeable disposition, desiring to make him (Mr. Labouchere) spend money. Well, let them take another instance. There was a Turk. That Turk was a swindler—he might say so now, because a jury had decided that a swindle had taken place. The French police had given him a statement referring to this Turk, and he published it in order to warn persons against him. The man immediately brought an action, and the case went on for a considerable time, and finally it was decided in his (Mr. Labouchere's) favour. His costs in that action amounted to £3,000 or £4,000—for he had been obliged to send to France and other places for evidence—and the Turk was ordered to pay those costs. But what did the Turk do? He went back to Turkey immediately. He (Mr. Labouchere) could only say that that was an instance of the way in which newspapers were blackmailed. The proprietors of newspapers were the persons who were supposed to attack unoffending persons, but this was the way in which they themselves were attacked. As an instance of the way in which newspapers were blackmailed, he could say that at this moment he was owed at least £7,000 for costs, which had been awarded to him by Courts of Justice, and that he would be happy to sell his entire claim to any hon. Gentleman in that House for a £50 note.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, he did not see how the evil that his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) mentioned could be entirely remedied, unless they said in the Bill that no action for libel could be brought against any newspaper proprietor whatever. He (Mr. Hunter) objected to this clause in the strongest manner possible. He had strongly supported the other clauses, but this seemed to him to be an unjust provision, because it would deprive 90 out of every 100 persons of any sort of legal redress. The libel might be as notorious as possible, as palpable as possible; but under this clause a poor man would have no means of getting redress, as the poor men who would come under the description given in it would amount to 90 per cent of the population. The hon. Member for South Islington (Sir Albert Rollit) suggested that the clause should be amended, so as to allow poor men to sue in cases where there was an apparent or prima facie case. Well, he (Mr. Hunter) had considered that very carefully beforehand, and the hon. and learned Attorney General carefully considered it, and he could not find any form which would enable him to carry out that object, and he did not think anybody would be able to propose an Amendment which would have the effect of carrying out that object. What protection was now given to newspapers by the existing law? It was in the Superior Courts, and the Superior Courts alone, that these enormous costs were run up, that the hon. Member for Northampton had alluded to; but in any case where they had a man of straw bringing an action in a Superior Court, they could, as the law now stood, have that case submitted to a County Court. That was the proper way to deal with such cases. It did not deprive a poor man of justice, or of any means of defence, while it protected the defendant against excessive and enormous costs; and he had no doubt that if advantage had been taken of the existing law by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere) he would have been able to show that the plaintiff was without visible means of paying his costs. Let him point out what was the real difficulty that lay behind this case. He admitted to the fullest extent the hardship inflicted upon wealthy men and wealthy newspapers by spurious actions being brought against them, but it must be remembered that newspaper proprietors were not the only persons liable to this evil. It was one of the disadvantages of wealth. If they were going to say to rich men that they were not going to be shot at by poor men, that would be tantamount to saying that poor men should not have redress from rich men. The general principle upon which they should act was, without depriving a poor man of justice, to give as much protection as possible to rich men in cases such as those referred to. It would be perfectly right in bogus cases for the Court to stop an action, but how could that be done? It could only be done by practically bringing the action before a Master or a Judge. If it was to be understood that an action was to take place "unless just cause to the contrary were shown"—which words the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General understood to mean unless a man had visible means of support—that would necessitate the whole facts of the case being gone into; but suppose the words were inserted, "unless the Judge is of opinion that there is a cause of action on the merits," that would mean that the case was going to be tried before the Master on affidavits instead of before a jury on evidence, and what did that mean? Why, that a defendant was to be allowed to heap insult upon injury. It would enable a defendant probably to make out a strong case on affidavits, and the poor man might be entirely deprived of his remedy. He should be ready to protect the rich man by giving a preliminary trial before the Master; but, as the clause now stood, it would inflict the grossest injustice upon poor men to give newspaper proprietors protection to which they had no claim.

Mr. Hunter

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, he would point out to hon. Gentlemen who had spoken already this remarkable fact—that scarcely a single individual who had risen to speak in favour of the clause had expressed himself in favour of it as it stood, but everyone who had spoken declared that something ought to be done to put everything right. One hon. Member had suggested that uncertified bankrupts should be taken out of the Bill, and that that would put everything right. Another hon. Member had suggested that a plaintiff having no visible means of being able to pay the costs should be struck out, and that that would make everything right; and the hon. Member for Northampton had suggested that to insert the words "the Judge should have power to" before the words "make an order," would set the matter right. Many recommendations had in this way been made, but it was a remarkable fact that no one who had made one of these suggestions had had the courage to write down what he suggested on a piece of paper and submit it to the Chairman. This clause was undoubtedly intended, and very properly intended, to meet a particular case, but he supposed all those in favour of the clause would agree that it was desirable that whatever the circumstances were, where a libel had been committed, there should be the means of taking action against the proprietor or editor of the newspaper. The great difficulty of dealing with a clause of this kind lay in the fact that they could not draw a line. No one could draw a line in his own mind, nor could they draw up an Amendment on the Paper which would give a fair and just line. It was proposed by the clause to leave it to the Judge to require a plaintiff to give security for costs unless just cause to the contrary was shown. But what was "just cause" in such a matter? Was it just cause that a man was poor? Surely, everyone would at once repudiate the idea that a man was to be excluded from getting redress for a grievous wrong—which they would for argument's sake assume was a grievous wrong—merely because he was a poor man. Everyone would repudiate that idea. Well, was it strong cause that the defendant was able to assert in the strongest words to the Judge that there was no ground for the action? Surely, everyone would admit that no affidavit, however strong, made by a defendant should have the slightest weight attached to it in such a case; therefore it came to this—that a Judge, before he could ascertain whether there was just cause or not, must make a slipshod, but still a pretty full inquiry into the merits of the case, and should practically decide the case before there was an opportunity for its being tried by a jury. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) told them of the vast cost he was put to in the case of the Turk to whom he referred—the vast cost he was put to in making inquiries in France and elsewhere. But he would have had to make those inquiries before he could prove the ground why the Turk should be precluded from bringing his action against him. Supposing that the Turk had been right and the hon. Member for Northampton wrong—an assumption which, he admitted, was very difficult to make, but he thought for argument's sake it might be ventured upon—assuming that this Turk suing the editor of a well-known newspaper was right, and that the editor of a well-known newspaper was wrong, in that case the poor Turk would have had to incur all the expense of making those inquiries in France for the purpose of satisfying the Judge, preliminary to the hearing of the action, that he had just cause for raising his action. The result, therefore, would be that that would put a man of no means under the absolute necessity of going to the expense, probably by the aid of some friend, of getting up an enormous case preliminary only to the question as to whether or not he was to be allowed to sue? He (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) thought that in many cases such a provision of law as this would lead to great injustice and oppression. He concurred in what the hon. Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) had said, that while it was hard upon rich people to be mulcted in certain sums of money in defending themselves from such actions as those referred to, it would be still more hard that poor men should be precluded from bringing their cases before a Court in order to obtain redress merely because of their poverty. Grave injustice would result from any such provision of law. He himself felt very much astonished to hear that the law in this country had gone so far as hon. Members represented it had gone. He thought it had gone a very great length indeed when a suitor, however strong his case might be, and however certain he might feel that a jury would award him a certain sum, should be precluded from having his case decided in the best Court to hear such a case, and was obliged to go to a County Court. [“No, no!”] Yes; he thought that that was the law; he had been so informed. The Judge seemed to have a discretion in the matter that the choice of the Court was not left to the plaintiff. However good the case he might have, if it was shown that he had no means of paying costs, the Judge might in his discretion send the case—it might be a very important one—to a very inferior Court. That was going a long way indeed towards relieving defendants of the difficulties of this clause, and if the Committee were to carry it any further they would be doing an act of gross injustice.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said, he agreed that they should have one uniform law applied to all cases, whether cases of libel or of employers' liability, whether the cases were against railway companies, or whoever they were against. The Committee should be alive to what was already the state of the law. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was not in his place, therefore he would not reply to some observations of that hon. Gentleman; but the hon. Member had asked what the existing law was, and he (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) was speaking in the presence of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, and, therefore, would be corrected if he was inaccurate in what he was about to say in reply to that question. At the present time, as he understood it, the County Court had no jurisdiction to try libel cases, except special cases provided for in the County Courts Acts proposed to be inserted in the Consolidation Bill now before Parliament. He would ask the House to see what protection was given to poor litigants, and whether it was not ample to meet the special cases put before the Committee with reference to the actions brought against newspapers? The existing law said that any person against whom an action—say for libel—was brought, on affidavit made that the plaintiff had no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant—not, as the hon. and learned Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) had said, had no visible means of subsistence—if the verdict was given against him, thereupon the Judge had power to do two of three things, to make an order that unless the plaintiff gave security for the costs, or satisfied the Judge that he had cause of action fit to be presented to the Court, all proceedings in the action might be stayed; and there was the alternative case of the plaintiff being unable, or unwilling, either one or the other, to give such security, or failing to satisfy the Judge that he had good cause of action, the Judge could make an order remitting the whole case for trial to the County Court, which would then have jurisdiction to try the case at, as everyone knew, a very moderate rate of costs. That was the general law with reference to these actions of tort. Was there any reason why actions for libel should be treated differently to all other actions? The hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) put very powerfully the case of actions brought by poor men who had been guilty of offences, and whose proceedings were made known for the benefit of the public. But there was also the case of the innocent poor man wishing to bring an action for libel which had to be considered. He (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) wished to reserve to himself every right to extend or modify this clause which it was proposed to re-enact this Session in the Consolidating Bill; but he thought that if the general law of the land was to be altered in this manner it ought to be in a Bill for the special purpose. For his own part, he should have some difficulty in supporting the third reading of this Bill if this clause were left in it.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 8 (On prosecution for libel knowledge of person proceeded against to be shown).

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, he had several Amendments to move which would make the clause read as follows:—

"No person shall be found guilty upon the trial of any indictment for information for the publication of a libel, if it be proved on behalf of the defence that such person was not party or privy to the publication of the libel charged in such indictment or information."

Mr. Henry H. Fowler

These Amendments—the effect of which would be to transfer the burden of proof from the prosecutor to the defendant, on whom it naturally rested—were so reasonable that he thought no objection would be taken to them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, he desired to say that he had an objection to this clause; yet he quite agreed that the Amendments proposed were improvements, and he thought, therefore, that the hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill would be well advised if he allowed the Amendments to be accepted, and then any further question which would arise could be discussed when the Question was put that the clause stand part of the Bill.

On the Motion of Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN, the following Amendments made:—In page 3, line 12, leave out "unless," and insert "if;" line 13, leave out "by affirmative evidence;" same line, leave out "prosecution," and insert "defence;" and, in line 14, after "was," insert "not."

Mr. DARLING (Deptford) said, on this clause he desired to move the following Amendment:—In page 3, line 16, after "information," to add "or to the publication of the newspaper wherein such libel was published." The object of the clause was to provide that no person should be found guilty of libel unless it were proved by the prosecution that he was privy to its publication. It was obvious under this clause, as it stood, that an editor or proprietor of a newspaper might escape punishment for libel by saying that he was away when the particular libel was published, and that, though it was true he was responsible for the publication of the paper, he had no connection with the offence complained of, having been away amusing himself somewhere else than at the office of the newspaper, and he might plead that the libel was really the work of some reporter or sub-editor. Newspaper proprietors were very frequently persons in very flourishing circumstances—for instance, a person to whom £7,000 was owing in the shape of costs awarded, but not recovered, must be a gentleman in flourishing circumstances. Well, it might happen that this gentleman—this editor or proprietor—was fulfilling duties in Parliament, and that, although responsible for the production of his paper, he interested himself not in its management, not in its supervision, in order to see that persons were not libelled in it, but in discussing the provisions of a new law for the amendment of the Law of Libel in Parliament. While he was doing that it was possible that a very bad libel might be inserted in his paper which would have never appeared had he paid closer attention to its supervision. In such a case he might simply say—"I left the management of the paper in the hands of persons in an inferior position, and though I have taken no trouble to see whether or not they are inserting libels I have divested myself of responsibility by handing the matter over to them." His (Mr. Darling's) Amendment was to provide that no such answer as that should be sufficient to release a newspaper editor or proprietor from responsibility.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 15, after "information," to add the words, "or to the publication of the newspaper wherein such libel was published."
—(Mr. Darling.)

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) said, he thought the hon. and learned Member had entirely mistaken the object of the clause, as he spoke as if it were intended to shield some guilty party. It would do nothing of the kind, but would entirely protect the innocent. The Committee had had its attention drawn to the fact that in certain cases newspaper proprietors managed their own businesses, and were directly responsible for what appeared in the columns of their journals—that was to say, they had given such and such orders, and were responsible for the carrying out of those orders. The clause was not for the protection of such as those at all; it was intended for the protection of another class of proprietors. Newspapers were generally owned by a number of proprietors who were essentially absentees from the places where those newspapers were published. Papers, for instance, in Liverpool and in other Provincial parts of the country, were very often owned by persons who had nothing whatever to do with their production beyond supplying the funds for carrying them on. If proprietors took part in the management of their papers they certainly ought to be responsible for what appeared in them; but the object of the clause was to prevent the imprisonment of gentlemen who had nothing to do with the libels, and very little to do with the newspapers, and also to save the publisher—an unhappy person, who was very often punished in these cases. It was an old joke against the newspapers that some of them kept a man who was ready to go to prison if they were prosecuted. The publisher was a man who had nothing to do with the production of a newspaper or its issue, except to hand over the sheets which he had never read to the newsmen and newsboys. In these modern days the publisher knew nothing whatever as to what was in the papers, and this law making a publisher responsible came down from times when those individuals occupied a very different position in connection with newspapers—from days when they took a responsible part in the production of the papers. But in these days the publisher and the proprietor were persons who ought not to be held criminally responsible for libel. That a proprietor should have to pay costs was, however, natural—that he should have to bear the responsibility for the negligence or the misdeeds of his servants was very proper; but he should not be held criminally guilty of libel when he could show that he was not privy or party to the publication of the libel charged.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he hoped the Government would not accept the Amendment, as its effect would be to render the clause entirely nugatory.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he did not know whether the Committee were quite aware—he begged to draw the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to it—that the clause as now amended, even with the addition of the hon. and learned Member, would entirely change the law. He said that was a great submission. It had been his duty, unfortunately, to have to argue the point more than once at considerable length, and he would point out that in the case of the "Queen v. Holbrook" the law was held to be just the reverse of what they now proposed to make it, with reference to the person publishing a paper, by the clause as it now stood. The clause, with the words proposed to be added by the hon. and learned Gentleman, would read—

“No person shall be found guilty upon the trial of any indictment or information for the publication of a libel, if it be proved on behalf of the defence that such person was not party or privy to the publication of the libel charged in such indictment or information.”

By the decision to which he had referred, it was not for the defendant to prove that he was not privy or party to the publication of the libel, but it rested with the prosecution to prove that he was privy to it. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL dissented.] With all respect for the superior knowledge of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General on this matter, he begged to say that he knew something of the case, the task having been more than once imposed upon him of arguing the matter before the Courts of Law. He had the clearest conviction that the law as laid down by the majority of the Judges was as he stated it. There had been a difference of opinion, no doubt, amongst the Judges; but the law as laid down in the case of the “Queen v. Holbrook” was the opinion of the majority. It was clear, therefore, that, by the proposal they were now making, they were changing the old Law of Libel. He did not say whether this was wise or not; but he would point out to the promoter of the Bill that he was very much more likely to go to prison for libel if he passed his own provision than he would be under the existing law.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, he would point out that, although the hon. Member for Northampton said he was not entitled to be described as “the learned Member,” he had studied legal questions very deeply, and was as deserving of that title as a great many learned Members. The hon. Member had intimate knowledge of many legal points, and he therefore could scarcely be looked upon as a layman in putting this matter before the Committee. In the present instance, however, the hon. Member had for once made a mistake in a point of law. The clause of the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, upon which the case of the “Queen v. Holbrook” was decided, provided that whenever on the trial of an indictment for the publication of a libel evidence was given which established a presumptive case of publication against the defendant by the act of any other person under his authority, it should be competent for a defendant to prove that the publication was made without his knowledge or consent, and that it did not arise from any want of due care on his part.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, that under the section there was no presumptive case of publication required to be made out.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, that the hon. Member probably thought that the omission of the words “presumptive of publication” might alter the law. As a matter of fact, Section 8 in the Bill, as amended, would be more in favour of defendants than the section of the old law to which reference had been made. There must be publication by servants or by himself, but in order to remove responsibility for the act of a servant it was competent for a defendant to show that he was not privy or party to the publication. Whether that was a prudent alteration of the law he did not argue; but he submitted that the hon. Member for Northampton was not quite correctly informed when he said that the law would be strengthened as against the defendant.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) said, he would point out to the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill that, supposing the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) was carried, the clause would become so meaningless that it would be better to drop it altogether. He thought that the Amendment was moved with the object of making the clause nugatory; and under the circumstances, if the opinion of the Committee was in harmony with that of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he thought the clause had better be omitted.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, that the clause related entirely to criminal charges, and he thought that some hon. Members were under a misapprehension. It was quite right that a newspaper proprietor should be held responsible in damages to the fullest extent for the conduct of his servants; but to say that a newspaper proprietor should be punished for an act of which he had no knowledge would be to introduce the principle of what might be called Chinese or vicarious punishment. It would be just the same as hanging a man for a murder committed by someone else. In Scotland, while damages might be recovered for libel, he did not recollect in the whole course of his life a single case of criminal prosecution for libel, and he would venture to say that, so far from the Press in Scotland being more licentious than the Press of England, it was much less so. He thought they would find that, notwithstanding the absence in practice of any criminal proceedings for libel in Scotland that there was not a single newspaper published in that country which would call itself a society newspaper—the class of newspaper in which these libels mostly occurred. If the hon. Member (Sir Algernon Borthwick) had proposed that all criminal indictments for libel should be done away with, and a civil remedy only retained, it would be an improvement in the law.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was correct in his statement that criminal prosecutions for libel against newspapers were of rare occurrence in Scotland. It would not be well, however, to do away with a law which would prevent libels of a gross kind, such as those published, for instance, to extort money; and there had been actions in such cases. At the same time, he acknowledged that criminal prosecutions against newspapers for libel were practically obsolete in Scotland.

MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire) said, that while no one desired to relieve the proprietors of newspapers from their civil liability and from damages for the acts of their servants, a very different class of considerations came before them when they considered their criminal responsibility. He wished the conditions in England were the same as those represented by several hon. Members to exist in Scotland, and that criminal prosecutions for libel were of rare occurrence, so that they should only be resorted to in aggravated cases in which such remedy appeared to be imperatively demanded. He thought that the Committee should be very careful before it did anything which would imply, on its part, a desire to extend the liability of newspaper proprietors. They had heard a great deal in the course of the discussion on this clause of hardship to private individuals who were sued; but there was a class of hardship which had not hitherto been mentioned, arising from the fact that sometimes a newspaper was published by a Company. The signature to the original memoranda or articles of association might be that of some person who was met in the street, and induced to contribute a small sum. Although that person might live some distance away, he was liable to be brought from a distance and to be criminally prosecuted—nay, to be fined or imprisoned—unless he could prove to a jury—and this at his own cost and inconvenience—that he was within the ruling in “the Queen v. Holbrook.” The general consensus of opinion in the Profession with regard to the case of “the Queen v. Holbrook” was in accordance with the opinion which had been expressed by the hon. and learned Attorney General. He entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Attorney General that the words “presumptive case of publication” really meant nothing, because the presumptive evidence might be given by proof of some such act as signing the articles of association, or memoranda, or something of that kind, which, if it were absent, the Judge would not be justified in leaving the case to the jury at all. He (Mr. Bowen Rowlands) was sensible of the great pain and injury individuals might suffer from the abuse of the great powers which the Press in the country possessed; but that was not sufficient to induce him to accept, or to hope that the Committee would accept, the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling), which would have the effect of rendering nugatory the clause, whether in its original shape or in the altered shape proposed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). Whether it was wise to add to the Bill any clause which affected the onus of proof he did not pretend to say; but, inasmuch as the Committee had already accepted the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire, it would be simply stultifying itself if it went further, and accepted the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Deptford, which would render the previous resolution of the Committee on the clause entirely nugatory.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, he was not satisfied with the language of the Amendment, and it was as well that he should state fairly at once how he regarded the Amendment. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) that the words of the Amendment were too wide. But in all probability there was one particular class of persons with regard to whom some words should be inserted. He thought some words should be inserted to meet the case of a newspaper proprietor who went away leaving the whole management and control to someone else, reckless as to what might be the actual conduct of the persons in charge of the paper.

MR. DARLING said, that after what had been said by the hon. and learned Attorney General, he thought the Committee would agree with him that it would not be wise to press the Amendment. The object he had in putting the Amendment down had really been served, because it was perfectly obvious that before the Bill became law something would have to be done to meet the difficulty which he had in his mind. He begged leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Amendment be, by leave, withdrawn."—(Mr. Darling.)

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) said, he was sorry the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Deptford had consented to withdraw the Amendment, because it seemed to him, after all was said and done, that somebody must be made responsible for these libels. He was exceedingly sorry—and he was sure that anyone who knew anything of his past history would know he had reason to be sorry—to support anything which would impose further restrictions on the newspaper Press. But what some of them asked was not that there should be further restrictions—the object of the measure was to remove restrictions which already existed—but under the words of Clause 8, "such person was party or privy to the publication of the libel," it would be difficult, in a great number of cases, to find out anyone who was actually responsible for what took place. It was all very well for hon. Gentlemen in the House who were connected with newspapers to speak of newspapers as though they were all of them conducted as certain newspapers were which one would undoubtedly have in his mind when discussing this matter. But there were newspapers and newspapers, and anyone acquainted with the Press of this country knew very well that some newspapers, instead of being edited in the ordinary sense, were practically handed over to what might be called the "printer's devil," and what kind of responsibility they could get out of that kind of editing was well known. The hon. and learned Attorney General intimated that it was possible to meet this difficulty by fixing the liability upon someone; if anything was done so that the liability should be absolutely fixed on some persons responsible, then it would be all right enough; but some hon. Members seemed to him to treat very lightly this question of libelling individuals. He could quite understand that many actions for libel had been brought against newspapers which ought never to have been brought. But let them take a bond fide case, the case of a man who had been robbed of his good name and his good character, and hon. Members would agree that the Press possessed the power of robbing a man of his good reputation. He thought it was a very grave thing indeed to relieve persons who might do as much injury to an individual man or woman, as the case might be, as though they half murdered him in the streets and robbed him of his watch. In many instances men had been absolutely ruined for life by the way in which they had been libelled by newspapers which had escaped penalty. There was one instance which might be known to hon. Gentlemen in the House, the case of a man who would have been an ornament to the House itself. That man tried to get into the House, but he was grossly libelled by some portions of the London Press. He referred to Mr. George Odger. When that man was dead some of the newspapers which had libelled him so grossly made much ado with regard to a public funeral. He (Mr. Howell) wanted to preserve the character of a man while he was living, and not to raise a monument over him when he was dead. He wished they could get rid of the Law of Libel in so far as it appertained to a criminal indictment, but if that were done there must be some other means of reaching men at fault. There were men of straw connected with newspapers as well as among those who took action against newspapers, and, therefore, civil liability might not be enough to deter such men from libelling others.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon) said, he was as anxious as anyone in the House that the Press of the country should be protected in its public functions, which, they must all admit, it discharged with great power and greater advantage to the public than the Press of any other country in the world. He thought it was also clear that those connected with newspapers should be protected against any criminal prosecution if they could show that they had used due caution in carrying on their trade. He had previously had to consider this question from the defendant's side, as it were, and not from the plaintiff's, because in the case of ship-owners the same question arose. Ship-owners carried on a trade which might be dangerous to life, and what they had always contended was that they were quite ready to be made responsible, even to the extent of being imprisoned, unless they could show they had used due care and caution for the protection of life and property. Therefore, what he proposed to add at the end of the clause was—

“And if it be shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the defendant had used all reasonable means to guard against such offences.”

He did not think that any respectable newspaper proprietor would object to those words. It would be, of course, for them to show that, if they had absented themselves from their business, they had left it in charge of a competent and proper person.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, to add at end of the Clause “and if it be shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the defendant has used all reasonable means to guard against such offence.”—(Mr. Rathbone.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, he thought that the words “to the satisfaction of the Court” were scarcely apt to use in the case of criminal proceedings. Possibly the hon. Member would be satisfied if his Amendment ran “and that the defendant has used all reasonable means to guard against such offence.” Of course, it was for the Committee to say whether they thought any such words as these should be inserted. The words of the law at present were “and that the said publication did not arise from want of due care and caution on his part.” If such a set of words were added, he thought that, in all probability, newspaper proprietors would be quite satisfied, and that would provide protection in cases in which proprietors took no active part in the conduct of the newspaper, and in other exceptional cases. The words certainly would do no practical harm to those respectable newspaper proprietors who desired to see the law strengthened in cases where there was careless and improper conduct.

MR. RATHBONE expressed his willingness to accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Attorney General, and asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, at end of Clause, insert “that the said publication did not arise from want of due care or caution on his part.”—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, “That these words be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) said, that, of course, if the Committee thought it desirable to paraphrase a section of Lord Campbell's Act, as they did in this clause, they were at liberty to do so. In his judgment, however, the law at present provided a far better remedy than that proposed by this clause for the protection of newspapers or of persons who were criminally prosecuted. This clause rather weakened than strengthened the position of such persons.

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport) said, he hoped the Committee would accept the clause as amended, because the object of it was not in the least degree to give protection to newspapers from the consequence of libel, but simply to protect persons who were connected with newspapers from being sent to prison for matters of which they had no cognizance. At present a part proprietor of a newspaper, a man who might probably have had a share in a newspaper left to him, and who had no control in the management, might be proceeded against criminally by any person who felt himself aggrieved, and possibly sent to prison for a libel of which he had no knowledge whatever. It was to prevent this that this clause had been introduced. The objection of the hon. Member for North-East Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell), and the very reasonable demand expressed by the hon. Gentleman that the guilty persons should be found out, were sufficiently met by the fact that, under the law as it at present stood, the guilty person was punished, and the newspaper had to pay heavily for the libel. He earnestly hoped that provision would be made that no one should be punished who had no knowledge of the libel complained of.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 9 (Person proceeded against criminally and the husband or wife of such person a competent witness).

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, that this clause raised again a question which had been dealt with on one of the previous clauses—namely, whether it was desirable to introduce in a special department of justice changes of procedure which, for the entire Criminal Law, were continued in another Bill? It might be said that there were exceptional circumstances connected with the law of libel. It might be that an indictment was sometimes preferred to a civil action in order to keep certain evidence out. At the same time he would like to hear something from some responsible Member of the Government as to whether it was desirable to enact for the purpose of a special department of law that which was already proposed to be made the general rule in the Criminal Law.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, he hoped the Committee would allow this clause to be inserted. There were 15 or 16 existing Acts of Parliament, in every one of which they had recognized the principle that the law should be amended in the direction of this clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 (Act not to extend to Scotland).

MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, his object in putting down the Amendment that this Bill should not apply to Ireland was that by the clause which they had just passed a proposal of the Criminal Evidence Amendment Bill became law in this Bill. They knew very well that hon. Gentlemen representing Irish constituencies particularly objected to the provision which had just been inserted in this Bill—they particularly objected that in criminal cases the defendant should be competent to give evidence. That had been objected to in former discussions, and it was because he was solicitous respecting the prejudices of hon. Members that he had put down this Amendment. He put it down in order that, if the Irish Members desired to do so, they might give expression to their opinions that, after all, it was advisable that in some cases, at all events, the defendants should be allowed to give evidence in criminal cases in Ireland, and that Judges and magistrates in Ireland were a class of people who might be trusted not to abuse the rights of prisoners to give evidence. He did not himself consider that Ireland should be excluded from the benefits of this Act, unless the Irish Members wished it. It had been said by a Scotch Member that the only good thing in the Bill was that it did not apply to Scotland. If Irish Members wished it to apply to their country they would say so. He would not press his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, he sincerely trusted that the benefits of the Bill would be extended to newspaper proprietors in Ireland, who ought to have those benefits just as much as any other proprietors. Out of 16 Acts of Parliament which created new offences, in regard to which defendants were allowed to give evidence, 14 applied to Ireland, and it would be a monstrous thing if the Committee were to exclude Ireland from the operation of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not understand the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Darling) to move his Amendment.

Mr. Jennings

MR. DARLING said, that he would not move it.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) submitted that the hon. and learned Gentleman had moved the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Before I attempted to put it to the Committee, I asked the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Darling) whether he intended to propose it.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (Short title) agreed to.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport) said, he had now to propose a new clause, which had been entrusted to him by a society representing many of the most important booksellers of the country, in order to give them what they felt to be a necessary protection from actions for libel to which they were at present subjected, under circumstances which certainly did not render them guilty of having taken part in the libel. It was a common thing for a gentleman to write to a bookseller, or to go to a bookseller, and order a particular book to be sent from London through that bookseller. The bookseller very possibly knew nothing about the contents of the book, and had nothing whatever to do with any libel which it might contain. It had often been made a matter of complaint against Mr. Mudie and other large firms that they really selected the books which appeared on their stalls, eliminating some on the ground that they contained matters that they did not approve of, matters of a political, libellous, or scandalous nature. It might be said that the clause, as it stood on the Notice Paper, would enable booksellers to sell books which had been printed and published abroad, and the printer and publisher of which could not be got at, and that, therefore, the person libelled would in such a case have no remedy. He, therefore, begged to move the clause in the following form:—

“In an action for libel contained in any book, magazine, pamphlet, or printed document other than a newspaper, such book, magazine, pamphlet, or printed document, having been published within the United Kingdom, and bearing the names and addresses of the publisher and printer thereof, against any person other than the author or part author or publisher or printer thereof, if it shall appear at the trial that the publishing of the libel complained of was the sale by the defendant of such book, magazine, pamphlet, or printed document, —therefore they would always have a printer and publisher in the United Kingdom against whom an aggrieved person could bring an action—

“And that such sale was made by the defendant in ignorance of the existence of the libel complained of, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to recover any damages except such special damages as he can prove he has sustained by such publishing of such libel.”

Therefore, if a particular act of publishing or sale by any bookseller of any book or pamphlet had done injury to the libelled person, then the bookseller, however innocent he might be, might still be rendered liable for an action for damages. He thought that with these safeguards the Committee would see that nothing more was asked than might be fairly asked; and, therefore, he trusted they would assent to the clause he proposed.

New Clause—(Extension of the Act to books, &c.)—(Mr. Sydney Gedge,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be now read a second time.”

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) said, he had already pointed out to his hon. Friend that, as the clause stood, if a book were printed abroad and sent over here, there would be no remedy, however gross the libel was, and in consequence its scope had been limited to matter published in the United Kingdom. He could not help thinking that this clause was wholly foreign to the scope of the Bill; they were dealing in the Bill with the protection of newspapers, and he did not consider it proper to go into the general question of the Law of Libel. That part of the clause dealing with the ignorance of the person selling a book was most illusory, because, if a bookseller chose to state that he had never looked into the book, it would not be in anybody's power to prove the opposite, and it would be absolutely impossible for the aggrieved person to obtain any remedy.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, he hoped the Committee would not add this clause to the Bill. It appeared to him to be a most dangerous clause, because it provided that a man who already was liable to a criminal prosecution for publishing a libel should not be liable to a civil action, unless the person he published the libel about could prove he had sustained special damage. They had passed Clause 5, which made provision concerning special damage. He was quite certain many Members of the Committee voted for that clause in the belief that the provision about special damage would somehow or other be removed, and some other qualification substituted for it. A newspaper proprietor or editor, or those who got up the newspaper from day to day, had control over it. The only reason that a man had for not selling scurrilous books was that he knew very well that if in one of them there was a libellous passage, he might be sued and liable in damages for scattering broadcast a libel. If the Committee passed this clause, anyone who was libelled would have no remedy against a bookseller, unless he could prove that he had sustained damage owing to the sale of the particular books the bookseller had sold. Booksellers ought to be careful as to the kind of literature they dealt in. For these reasons, and also for the reason that the clause was not germane to a Newspaper Libel Bill, he hoped the clause would not be read a second time.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) said, the object of the clause of which he had given Notice was to extend to writers in newspapers and others similarly situated the protection already extended, or supposed to be extended, to the proprietors and editors and other persons concerned in the publication. With the permission of the Committee, however, he would alter the exact terms of the clause, in deference to representations which had been made to him by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General that the wording of the clause, as it stood on the Paper, was somewhat too wide. As he proposed to move it, the clause would stand thus—

The wording that he had now adopted was exactly that which was already to be found in the existing Act, with the exception of the first words, which extended the protection of the law not only to proprietors of newspapers, to editors, and to other persons connected with the publication of newspapers, but also to writers in newspapers. With regard to the general principle of the advantage of there being a public officer to stand between vexatious complainants—between blackmailing enterprizes and a writer for, or proprietors, or editors, of a newspaper—he might say he was himself somewhat in the position of an expert, because, in the official position which he had the honour to hold in India, he was, in a way, the intermediary between the Government and Government officers and the Vernacular Press, and when Government officers desired to put into action the procedure of the Vernacular Press Act, the proposals were, in due course of official routine, submitted to him for his opinion, in order that he could advise the Government. He was strongly of opinion it was very desirable there should be a public officer of this description, and that protection should not only be extended to proprietors and editors of newspapers, but also to all writers in newspapers and other persons similarly situated. He should have preferred to have adhered to the terms of the clause on the Paper; because he had been informed that, as the law in England stood, the direction of the Public Prosecutor was not very often efficiently exercised in this matter. No doubt, the Attorney General would correct him if in that impression he was wrong. He certainly thought that the direction, such as it was, should not be confined merely to proprietors and editors of newspapers, but should extend to writers in newspapers. He, therefore, begged to move the clause.

New Clause—

“No summons shall be issued by any magistrate against any person charged with having committed a libel, nor shall any criminal proceedings be initiated in any Court without the written fiat of the Director of Public Prosecutions in England or the Attorney General in Ireland being first had and obtained.”—(Sir Roper Lethbridge.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, it was perfectly impossible for him to support the clause, and he hoped he had not led his hon. Friend to think that he had the slightest intention of supporting it. What he had done was to point out to the hon. Gentleman that the clause he had put down was one which would create an entirely new tribunal, and one which was practically incompatible with the discharge of Public Business. Let him say why he thought the clause ought not to be adopted. The proprietor, publisher, editor, or persons responsible for the publication of a newspaper, could not be proceeded against criminally, without the fiat of the Public Prosecutor, and he never heard it suggested that there had been any unfairness in the working of the existing Act. What did the hon. Gentleman suggest? Why, that the exemption should be extended to the writer and publisher of every single libel. He was sure there were some Members of the Committee who remembered the discussion at the time the Act of 1881 was passed. It was felt then that some protection was required for newspaper proprietors and editors, and accordingly exceptional legislation took place, though not without considerable misgiving. Some thought even then they were going too far. Could it be suggested that a man who sat down and wrote a malicious libel, not only in newspaper but in a letter, should also be protected? On what public grounds could it be said that this protection should be extended to the writers in newspapers? In order to justify such an amendment of the law, his hon. Friend must have an overwhelming case.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, that when the Newspaper Libel Bill was brought in in 1881, it was argued that this protection must be limited to proprietors and editors of newspapers. The Attorney General now said it would be perfectly monstrous that this protection should be extended to a writer for a newspaper, because he wrote his article in cold blood. [Sir RICHARD WEBSTER: No, no!] The editor himself very frequently wrote a libel, and wrote it in cold blood. [Cries of "Oh!"] Well, in hot blood. An editor was supposed to look over all the articles which appeared in his paper, and that, at least, he did in cold blood.

The writer of a libel might be carried away by his feelings; but the editor sat calmly and coolly at his desk, and decided whether the writer had gone further than he ought to. Under these circumstances, it seemed to him (Mr. Labouchere) it was perfectly reasonable that this protection should be extended to the writers for newspapers. He never before understood the distinction between the proprietors and editors of newspapers and the rest of the public. He had always asked that the same protection should be afforded to the entire public as was afforded by the Newspaper Libel Act to editors and proprietors of newspapers.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that Clause 7 was not passed. He was under the impression it would be passed, and, therefore, he did not put down his own clause. The Committee would remember that when the discussion on that clause was proceeding, he pointed out, as one of the monstrosities of the present system, that it was impossible to obtain security for costs against anyone who was not domiciled in this country. His right hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) contested that point with him. He (Mr. Labouchere) went to the Library and got an authority which he had no doubt the right hon. and learned Gentleman would accept; it was a book by George Osborne Morgan, Q.C., M.P.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not understand what the hon. Gentleman proposes.

MR. LABOUCHERE: My clause relates to the question of domicile.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Committee has refused to grant any privileges with regard to costs, and, therefore, it is not now competent to submit any proposal for the security of costs.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Wednesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 294.]

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS ACT (1866) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 161.]

(Mr. Dugdale, Mr. Whitmore, Mr. Wharton,
(Mr. Curzon, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Mark Stewart.)

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 2 (Youthful offenders may be sent to certified reformatories without the imposition of a term of imprisonment).

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 24, to leave out from "by" to end of Clause, in order to add "justices of the peace acting in and for the petty sessional division of the county, or in and for the borough, where the offender was convicted."

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 3 (Temporary detention).

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, it appeared to him that by the clause they were departing from what had been the system of criminal administration. Great care ought to be taken as to the places where persons were to be temporarily detained; in fact, there was an elaborate system by which all prisons were under the supervision of the Home Office. Under this clause there was to be a system of private prisons, which were to be under no supervision, so far as he could make out. He was quite aware that such a system as was proposed was in operation in respect to industrial schools; but he did not think his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Dugdale) would dispute his statement, that there was a broad distinction between industrial and reformatory schools. Reformatory schools were only intended for those against whom there was some charge of a criminal nature. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 29, leave out the words from "direct" to "therein" in page 2, line 2, and insert "remand such offender."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

MR. DUGDALE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton) said, he could not accept the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend. The clause which had just been passed provided that on a child being convicted, the magistrates might send him straightway to a reformatory school, and Clause 3 was intended to provide for cases where a reformatory school could not be found at the time.

His hope and expectation was that when this Bill was passed, Benches of Magistrates would have a register of the vacancies which existed in reformatory schools, so that when a child was convicted of an offence they would know where he could be sent. The clause provided for the temporary detention of a child in some place, not a prison, until a reformatory school could be found to which he might be sent. The effect of the Amendment would be that the child would be remanded to a prison, and that would defeat the whole object of the Bill.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University) said, the object of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Nuneaton Division of Warwickshire (Mr. Dugdale) was humane and laudable, but he could not help thinking that his sentiments had run away with him. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to have made a confusion between the two classes of schools. An industrial school was a place to which a child whom it was desired to save from crime was sent; whereas a reformatory school was an establishment to which a child already criminal was sent. It was, therefore, wrong to treat industrial and reformatory schools on the same footing. The Bill provided that when a child had been convicted he was to be sent to some undefined place. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson) was quite right in saying that they ought to know something about the place to which children were to be sent, not only in the interest of the children themselves, but in the interest of the community at large. As the child came from the place of detention, there was no hardship in sending him back to a place of detention.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster) said, he should like to hear further from the promoters of the Bill as to what place they had in view in which children should be detained. Did the words "not being a prison" refer to the lock-up at Petty Sessional Courts? He was quite sure that if the offenders were not remanded, the only place they could be safely sent to was the lock-up, and he should, therefore, strongly support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Preston.

MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon) said, he wished to point out that the clause was only permissive; it was not compulsory on the magistrates. If the offence was sufficient to warrant it, the magistrate would order the culprit to be sent to prison, and thence to a reformatory. Their object was to prevent the child becoming what was known as a "gaol bird," and to allow him to be detained at the house of the Superintendent or Inspector, or as the magistrate might decide, until the reformatory school was ready to receive him. That, again, was simply a permissive and not a compulsory power, which they wished to confer on the magistrates.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) said, there was a tendency among hon. Gentlemen supporting the Amendment to exaggerate the difference as between children sent to a reformatory school and those sent to an industrial school. At a reformatory the children had indeed been convicted of crime, but they were really of the same character as those sent to industrial schools. A large number of them were very young children, whom it was almost a crime to send to gaol, and there was in the country a growing feeling against this being done. He hoped the Committee would support the clause, and not accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson). It was right, in his opinion, that discretion should be given to the magistrates, and if they found before them a boy of 14 years of age, whom it would be dangerous to send to the workhouse, he thought it was well to allow them to send him to prison. On the other hand, in a case where there was considerable hope of improvement in the future, surely it would be a right thing to allow the magistrates to send the child to the workhouse or some other place, where he could be securely kept until he could be sent to the school.

MR. TOMLINSON said, if, as it was contended, the power was optional, the Bill itself should say what the alternative was to be.

MR. DUGDALE said, it was practically in the discretion of the magistrate, and the words were taken from the Industrial Schools Act, 1866. By that Act, if there were no poor house at a convenient distance, the child was to be detained in such other place, not being a prison, as the magistrate thought fit. These words of the Act he had incorporated in the present Bill. No doubt, some person could be found to whom the magistrate would be willing to entrust the child for safe custody until a reformatory was ready for him. He would be sent sometimes to a place in the neighbourhood, or sometimes to a workhouse, as the case might be. If they thought that the child ought to be sent to prison, they could send him there; but he hoped that in many cases they would be able to send him direct to a reformatory. A case had occurred within his own knowledge of a boy who stabbed a man in the street, and so nearly killed him that he would have died had he not been within a very short distance of a neighbouring hospital. The boy was sent to prison for 14 days and then to a reformatory; but, from the circumstances, he (Mr. Dugdale) would have been glad if he could have sent him to a reformatory at once, but was unable to do so owing to the state of the law. That case, in his opinion, showed the necessity for a clause of this kind.

MR. WHARTON said, the hon. and learned Member for Preston did not take note of the fact that a remand was ordered during the progress of a case. But they were dealing here with a case that had been concluded.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he wanted to know what was the alternative, seeing that the clause was optional? He understood his hon. and learned Friend to say a short time ago that it was a remand, but now he said it was not so.

MR. DUGDALE said, the clause gave power to detain the offender until he was sent to a reformatory.

MR. TOMLINSON said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not shown the alternative to sending him to prison while he was waiting to go to a reformatory.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, he did not see the difficulty suggested by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Preston, because the magistrate, under the Act, would have power if necessary, and if nobody could be found to take charge of the child, to give him a short term of imprisonment in order to keep him in custody. As he understood the clause it gave the magistrate permission to omit the sentence of imprisonment, but prison authority of the district in which the conviction took place.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Escaping from places of detention) agreed to.

Clause 7 (Penalty on persons inducing offenders to escape).

Mr. J. G. TALBOT said, that two months seemed hardly an adequate term of imprisonment to correspond to a money penalty of £20, and as the maximum term of imprisonment was rarely imposed, it would end in the practice of only a month's imprisonment being usually inflicted for offences so serious as inducing young offenders to abscond, or harbouring them when they had absconded.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 11, leave out the word "two," and insert the word "six."—(Mr. J. G. Talbot.)

Mr. DUGDALE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton) said, he thought the hon. Gentleman could hardly be aware that two months' imprisonment was the maximum term that could be imposed under the Industrial Schools and Reformatory Schools Acts.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, he had an Amendment to move to substitute the word "Court" for the word "Justices."

THE CHAIRMAN said, in that case the Amendment before the Committee would have to be withdrawn.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD, the following Amendment made:—In line 11, leave out the word "Justices," and insert the word "Court."

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 11, to leave out the word "two," and insert the word "six."—(Mr. J. G. Talbot.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, that they were entitled to some more solid reason against this Amendment than had been given by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Dugdale), when he referred to the penalty in the existing Acts. There might be many cases in which it would be worth while to get the boy out of the way; and as he took it that the Bill was intended to be largely acted upon, he thought the Committee ought to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. J. G. Talbot), which he should do if it went to a Division.

An hon. MEMBER said, he should like to point out that under the Summary Jurisdiction Act a fine not exceeding £20, or not exceeding two months' imprisonment, was imposed on the person who concealed or assisted an offender to escape. If, therefore, the Amendment were agreed to, they would have in force two Acts of Parliament at variance with each other.

Mr. DUGDALE said, it would be very inconvenient to insert in the Bill a term of imprisonment different from that which was provided under the Act of 1866, and he, therefore, felt bound to oppose the Amendment.

Mr. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster) said, that this was a most merciful Provision, and in the interest of the children themselves, and in order that the system might have a fair chance of working, the penalty on anyone who frustrated the object of the measure ought to be a very severe one. He should, therefore, support the Amendment.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 260; Noes 61: Majority 199.—(Div. List, No. 148.)

Preamble read, and agreed to.

Clause 1 (Affirmation may be made instead of oath).

Mr. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) said, in rising to move the Amendment in his name, he would not disguise from the Committee his intention to meet this Bill on all its stages with uncompromising opposition and hostility. He believed that if, unfortunately, the Bill should be carried through Committee, and through the House, there would be throughout the country a feeling of intense indignation and sorrow. On the present occasion he should endeavour to excise from what he had to say anything of a personal nature. He was obliged to remark that it was the function of the House of Commons to represent the interests of the nation at large, and not the interests of one individual, and it was surprising to him that so many days and hours should have been wasted on a matter, which, except in a religious sense, was one of inferior importance. He contended that, under Standing Order 63, the portals of the House of Commons were open to men of every persuasion.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he would point out to the hon. Gentleman that he must speak to the Amendment he proposed to move.

Mr. NORRIS said, he was under the impression that he was speaking to his Amendment, which was to the effect that the Bill should not apply to those who stated that they had no religious belief, and he was about to adduce argument on which that Amendment was based. He had said that they had opened their portals very widely already, and would add that, for his part and on behalf of those who thought with him, he was not disposed to admit Gentlemen who were not prepared to take the Oath, or to make affirmation in the form in which it was now prescribed. He warned the House that irreligion was spreading, and, as was shown by a Paper by a Rev. Bishop, large meetings were held in Vistoria Park on Sundays, at which the most sacred subjects were discussed with profanity and ribaldry. As he had said, they welcomed in their midst men of every religious persuasion; but they were asked in this Bill to allow men who had no religious belief whatever to make a solemn affirmation.

Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) rose to Order. The word "solemn" was the subject of a later Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must impress on the hon. Gentleman the necessity of giving some point to his argument.

Mr. NORRIS said, that no man had greater deference for the Chair than himself, and he, of course, bowed to that intimation. He held in his hand an extract from a speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who, in 1880, said that no new law was necessary to enable a Member to go to the Table and be sworn. They had, under the Rules of Procedure, the opportunity of taking the Oath and the opportunity of making affirmation; what more, then, was necessary? He and his hon. Friends were not prepared to ignore the religious feelings inherent in the people of this country, by whom, from the Sovereign to the peasant, the name of God was revered. For his own part, he would, in the matter of this Bill, accept no compromise, considering it, as he did, fraught with evil consequences and contrary to the first principle of religion. Therefore, in defence of political, moral, and religious principles, he begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 6, after the word "person," to insert the words "excepting those who state they have no religious convictions."—(Mr. Norris.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. BRADLAUGH said, it was perfectly impossible that the House could accept this Amendment, which went in the teeth of the principle of the Bill as affirmed by a majority of 100 in a full House. He did not condescend to discuss what the hon. Member called the reasons for his Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Anderson.)

Mr. BRADLAUGH said, it was of course impossible to make effective progress with the Bill that day, and therefore, as the Amendment was of importance, he did not oppose the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday next.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.—[BILL 2.]

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Heneage.)

MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe) said, he desired to ask Mr. Speaker, whether it would be competent to him to move in Committee an Amendment authorizing marriage with a deceased husband's brother? If not, he would move an Instruction to the Committee.

MR. SPEAKER: The object which the hon. Gentleman has in view can only be attained by an Instruction to the Committee.

MR. M'LAREN said, the principle involved in the Instruction was very important, and it was one which the House could not possibly consider in the four minutes which remained for discussion; therefore, in order that the question might come forward at a more convenient period, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. SPEAKER said, he would point out to the hon. Gentleman that the Motion had not yet been moved.

MR. M'LAREN said, he would, in that case, merely move the Instruction of which he had given Notice; and, as he did not wish to delay or talk out the Bill, he would not say anything further.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to extend the scope of the Bill so as to include marriages between a woman and her deceased husband's brother."—(Mr. Walter M'Laren.)

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, as the hon. Member had not used any arguments in support of his Motion, he did not think it necessary to offer any in opposition to it, and would, therefore, claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

MR. SPEAKER: As no arguments have been adduced on either side, I cannot consent to put the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford, University) said, he might perhaps be allowed to say a few words upon this Instruction, which he thought the hon. Member had not moved in language adequate to the subject. For his part, he could take no share in it. But he wished to point out that while the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) would, by his Bill, pull out one stone of the great and sacred fabric of the Marriage Laws of the country, other hon. Gentlemen were desirous of pulling out many others.

It being half-past Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Wednesday next.

AUGMENTATION OF BENEFICES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 78.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that there were certain funds at his disposal, derived from the sale of certain livings, for the augmentation of benefices. The sum, unfortunately, did not now exceed £5,000. At present the amount which he could allocate out of this money in augmentation of a clergyman's income depended in each case upon the number of the population of the parish. The object of the Bill before the House was to abolish this condition and to enable him to augment livings which were below £200 a-year without paying regard to population. A clergyman, he held, ought not to be asked to undertake the work of any parish for a smaller income than £200. The Bill would enable him to augment benefices up to that amount.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

OPEN SPACES (METROPOLIS) — THE LAW COURTS SITE; WESTMINSTER ABBEY (PARLIAMENT SQUARE); THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MEATH said, he rose to ask Her Majesty's Government the first of three Questions with reference to open spaces, and it was, Whether it was their intention within a reasonable period to build over the entire open space at present adjoining the Law Courts, and bounded on the Western and South-Western sides by King's College Hospital and Clement's Inn; and, if not, whether they would have any objection to lay out and maintain as a public garden such portion of the space as they do not intend to cover with buildings? Although this space was not a large one, it was one well worth preserving or allowing the public to use until it was built upon. It was the only spot from which the Law Courts could be well seen to advantage. The district was densely populated, and it was very badly off for open spaces. The experience of the Metropolitan Public Gardens Association was that the working classes could be trusted to maintain order among themselves and to preserve property of which they had the enjoyment. He understood the Government desired to build Bankruptcy offices in close proximity to the Law Courts; but that was no reason why this site should be left in its present dilapidated condition; nor would that be a necessary consequence of making a road through it if it were necessary to do it. It was two years since it was said that Bankruptcy buildings were going to be built, and yet nothing had been done; and if the land was not going to be appropriated at once the public might have the enjoyment until it was required.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, there was an apparent inconsistency between this Question and the third on the Paper, in which the noble Earl suggested the planting of trees on the space near the British Museum, which trees would interfere with the public view of the building. It appeared that wherever the noble Lord saw an open space he desired to plant trees.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that one or two trees would not destroy the view of either building.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he would support the appeal of the noble Earl for permission to use the Law Courts space as a recreation ground, a privilege which, to judge from experience, would be greatly appreciated; the neighbourhood being densely populated, Lincoln's Inn Fields being unfortunately still closed, and only a narrow strip of embankment garden at all within reach.

LORD HENNIKER said, the Bankruptcy offices were to be built chiefly upon a part of the site of Clement's Inn acquired by the Government last year. Part of this open space might also be wanted for these offices and part or all of it might also be required—and it was impossible to say how soon—for the extension of the Royal Courts of Justice, which he was told by the First Commissioner was desired by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. At the present time there were many demands upon the Office of Works for new buildings, as, for instance, the War Office and Admiralty buildings, and others, and it might be some years before the Treasury would grant all the money required for the improvements of the Royal Courts of Justice. If in the meantime any expense were to be incurred in making the land available for recreation, such expense ought to be borne by the Metropolis rather than by the funds provided by Parliament, inasmuch as the benefit was of a local kind, and not one which should be paid for by the Imperial Exchequer. If the Metropolitan Board, the local Vestry, or the Metropolitan Gardens Association, over which the noble Earl presided, desired to adapt the land temporarily as a recreation ground, the Office of Works were perfectly willing to consider any scheme that might be submitted to them, subject to the imperative condition that the liberty of the Government to deal with the land for their own purposes at any time should not be in any way prejudiced.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said, it seemed to him an extraordinary proposition that land purchased at great cost for Courts of Justice should be devoted to other purposes. Of course, he had nothing to say to any temporary use of it that might not interfere with its ultimate destination; but the administration of justice to clamouring suitors was hampered by the want of Courts to sit in, and in these circumstances it was impossible for the Government to commit itself to devote a piece of land bought expressly for Courts of Justice at a high price to any other purpose whatever. As to the inconvenience of the Courts of Justice, it was only just to remember that they were planned for one system of administration and were used for another, and if any inconvenience resulted it was not the fault of the architect or of those who adopted the plans; but, speaking from personal experience, he did not find there was much inconvenience, and he certainly thought that the new Courts were an improvement upon the old ones.

EARL NELSON said, he thought the site in question was originally purchased for the rebuilding of one of the churches in the Strand—St. Clement Danes—when it was taken down for the widening of the Strand.

LORD HERSCHELL said, he hoped that no Government would ever contemplate building upon the whole or the greater portion of the site in question; it would spoil the view of the existing buildings if they did. The public would benefit much more from leaving the land as an open space than from occupying any portion of it with buildings. There was always a temptation if you had a vacant piece of land to build upon it. He should like to see so much of this land as was really necessary to preserve the view of the present buildings from obstruction definitely devoted to a purpose that would render it in the highest degree unlikely that it would ever be built upon.

THE EARL OF MEATH begged, on behalf of his Association, to thank the noble Lord (Lord Henniker) for the offer he had made on behalf of the Government. He wished, further, to ask Her Majesty's Government, whether they would permit the public to enter during the hours of daylight the small enclosure facing the Abbey and the Houses of Parliament, in which the statue of Canning was situated? He did not think that there was any necessity for further open spaces in the neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament. There were several in the district around; but there was no spot where a foreigner or any individual who visited the Metropolis could sit down in peace and quiet and contemplate and study carefully the architectural beauties which surrounded Parliament Square. He thought that a few seats should be provided. The Association with which he was connected had placed seats in the open space in front of the Abbey, but no view of the Houses of Parliament could be had from them. All he asked was that the spot to which his Question referred should be thrown, as it were, into the roadway, just as they saw such places in Continental towns, and that the grass and shrubs should be left and seats placed there.

LORD HENNIKER said, that the Question of the noble Earl pointed to the Square being thrown open to foreigners and strangers. The First Commissioner of Works had considered the question carefully, and he was of opinion that it was impossible to reserve an open space such as was proposed for any particular class of persons, and he did not consider that this spot of ground was a suitable one to which the general public should be admitted.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not understand that the Question had been put in the form in which the noble Lord seemed to think it had—namely, as to whether this open space should be reserved entirely for foreigners and strangers, which was obviously impossible. The object was to have the spot thrown open for the benefit of all.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) said, that reference was made by the noble Earl (the Earl of Meath) to contemplative persons. He was afraid that the small boys of London would infest and take possession of the Square if they threw it open, and their occupations would not favour that æsthetic contemplation which the noble Earl desired to see.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he hoped the noble Lord would reconsider his decision. He thought that there were places in the Square where seats could be placed under the trees. If the existing railings were moved a few feet back, behind the seats, the houses would be effectually protected from annoyance.

LORD HENNIKER said, that he thought there would be no difficulty in placing seats in Parliament Square if desired. There were many reasons which he had not thought it right to trouble their lordships with, such as the question of which the noble Marquess—the Prime Minister—had spoken of, injury to property, and so on, which would result upon the throwing open of this spot.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON asked, whether the noble Lord would undertake that seats should be placed in Parliament Square where it was possible to do so?

LORD HENNIKER said, he would undertake to submit the matter to the First Commissioner of Works.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL said, he was of opinion that the Government had come to a sound decision not to throw this space open to the public. Such a change would be injurious and unjust to vendors and purchasers of property.

THE EARL OF MEATH asked Her Majesty's Government whether they would at the proper season plant some trees in the open space in front of the British Museum? He thought that if trees were more generally planted, as they were in America, where in some places everyone planted a tree on a particular day, it would be an excellent thing. Their Lordships were well aware that trees added not only to the beauty of the Metropolis, but also to the health of London.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he certainly had no wish to stop the planting of trees in the Metropolis; but he thought that they could have too much of a good thing. Care should be taken not to plant the trees too close together, and allowance ought to be made for their rapid growth, as it was very undesirable that views of the Parks should be shut out by them.

LORD HENNIKER said, that he could not then give an answer to the Question put by his noble Friend, because the matter was at present under the consideration of the Trustees of the British Museum, who had not yet conveyed their views to the First Commissioner of Works.

COMPANIES ACTS.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY), in rising to call attention to the Companies Acts, and to present a Bill to the House, said: Your Lordships may remember that in the Gracious Speech from the Throne at the opening of the Session, it was intimated that a measure would be introduced dealing with the question of Limited Liability Companies. I am afraid, however, that the prospects of Business in "another place" render it impossible for us to deal with the whole subject in the way which would be most satisfactory. By the most satisfactory way, I mean by introducing something in the nature of a Consolidation and Amendment Bill at the same time. At the same time, it is a subject which would be properly dealt with in that manner; but, as I have said, it is impossible from the state of Business in "another place" to assume that any Bill of that character would have any chance of passing in the present Session. The Government have, therefore, been compelled to take what they believe to be the most prominent points which require immediate amendment, and to place them in a comparatively short and small measure, and to invite your Lordships to agree to it. Of course no one would suggest that there should be anything in the nature of restriction on the various industrial associations, called by whatever name they may be, upon which so much of the commerce and industry of this country is dependent. Your Lordships will probably remember that in 1856, Mr. Lowe, then a Member of the other House and now a distinguished Member of this House, introduced a Joint Stock Companies Bill; and one particular branch of it he treated in a somewhat light-hearted way. I think the then existing law was passed in pursuance of the recommendations of a Select Committee; and Mr. Lowe—I will not say as his manner was, but as certainly sometimes occurred in his speeches—indulged in a certain amount of sarcasm on those who had previously dealt with the subject, suggesting that the Select Committee, which had set for a very long time, seemed to be rather composing a sensational novel than legislating; because in their Reports they referred to the systematic plunder which had been carried on and the fate of the unhappy victims, and he asked what became of the knaves. No doubt a great many of the subjects which the Committee dealt with pointed very much to the existence of that class of persons. I am afraid it is not possible now to deal with the existence of the class of persons who get up Companies to defraud numbers of unwary people; and, undoubtedly the existence of such a class and their success operate injuriously in more ways than one. A great amount of capital has undoubtedly been employed since the passing of the Limited Liability Act with advantage to the State; but it is also true that to the State a great amount of capital has been lost and has passed into the pockets of fraudulent persons; and it has sometimes been the experience of those who sit in the Courts of Law that the fraudulent promoter of one period of the year is the wrecker of the next period of the year; and that he may turn up in a third character as the promoter of a company which is to rise, Phoenix-like, from the ashes of the Company which he first founded and then destroyed and took from its assets all that it possessed of any value. Under these circumstances, it has been strongly urged from various parts of the country that some measures should be taken, if possible, to prevent the fraudulent initiation of Companies—not, indeed, to protect people from rash adventure. I entirely agree with the argument of Mr. Lowe on the occasion to which I have referred, that you cannot protect people from the consequences of rash speculation. They must look out for themselves. But you can try to prevent the machinery which the State has invented from being made use of for improper and fraudulent purposes; and it is in that direction that the legislation to which I invite your Lordships' attention is intended to operate. The principal machinery which is intended to work in that direction is by introducing a system of provisional registration, which will impose on those who initiate Companies the necessity of taking on themselves the responsibility which they now too often thrust on other persons, and will secure that there shall be some kind of guarantee that the Companies themselves have some kind of foundation—solid foundation—as evidenced by the best test that can be applied—namely, that there shall be a certain amount of capital actually in hand, and that those persons shall be made responsible who are putting forward the Company—who are the promoters, in fact—a word which is very easy to use and understand, but not always so easy to define when you come to a Court of Law for the purpose of attaching responsibility. The provisional registration having been obtained, it will be an essential condition of the Company's obtaining incorporation that certain conditions shall be complied with; one of them being, as I have said, the necessity of proving that they have that proportion of their capital paid up, that there are such and such a number of bond fide shareholders, and that the persons who are taking upon themselves the creation of this new legal venture under the Joint Stock Acts shall themselves be persons who have a substantial interest in the concern. In 1867 the defective state of the law, with reference to the class of persons to whom I have referred and the familiar machinery of fraud which was being constantly employed, induced the Legislature to pass an Act amending the former Acts and to pass what we know as the 38th section of that Act. It is as well that I should call your Lordships' attention to the provisions of that section. It provides:—

“Every prospectus of a Company, and every notice inviting persons to subscribe for shares in any Joint Stock Company, shall specify the dates and the names of the parties to any contract entered into by the Company, or the promoters, directors, or trustees thereof, before the issue of such prospectus or notice, whether subject to adoption by the directors, or the Company, or otherwise; and any prospectus or notice not specifying the same shall be deemed fraudulent on the part of the promoters, directors, and officers of the Company knowingly issuing the same as regards any person taking shares in the Company on the faith of such prospectus, unless he shall have had notice of such contract.”

Now, I cannot congratulate the draftsman on the mere language of the section; but, apart from the drafting, the difficulties that exist under that section are such that it is impossible not to know that almost every Court has expressed a different opinion on the effect of the section. First, as respects contracts entered into by the Company itself, every contract for everything, for a sheet of paper, a pen, or a bottle of ink, of course, is included in those general words; and when you come beyond that to the portion of the section which follows, and which requires the disclosure of the particulars of any contract entered into by the promoters or trustees before the issue of the prospectus or notice, the words are so general as to comprehend every contract entered into by them. I have no doubt that the draftsman had in his mind that some limitation ought to be placed on them, as, for instance, that the contracts were to have relation to the business of the Company.

There was the absolute difficulty of putting any such limitation upon it, and finding, I suppose, that difficulty, he got rid of it by omitting any limitation at all, and has left it to the Courts of Law to find out what limitation they could impose. The Courts of Law vainly endeavoured to do so. I only point to this as establishing this proposition that some provision of this kind, some check of this sort upon what the promoters do, is necessary. This, of course, raises the difficulty as to what a promoter is. The difficulties of the Courts in their construction of the term have been such that I think it is very obvious that some alteration of the law is required. It is, of course, easy to criticize and to point out that there is a defect; it is not always so easy to supply a remedy. I do not mean to say that the provisions, to which I shall invite your Lordships assent, will conclusively get rid of the difficulty, because it is inherent in the nature of the thing. The iron framework of a definition is not capable of the elasticity of the Common Law, and the moment you have caught the promoter by some kind of language, the moment you have something like a definition of a specific description of the persons of the class referred to, they immediately set themselves to get outside the exact wording of the clause and perform the same operation which has been prohibited in a different way. There is one other class of provisions to which I invite your Lordships' attention. One of the great complaints made has been the mode in which the assets of the Company are represented in its accounts. Your Lordships know that Banking Companies, under a specific provision, are compelled to submit the accounts to an auditor and to publish them. That provision does not apply to joint stock banks generally, and it has been brought to my attention that in a great many instances, particularly in the North of England, companies have been started with alleged capital in which worn-out machinery is represented as being of prime value and at cost price. That was said to be one of the great sources of the frauds committed by persons who get up companies, buying old worn-out machinery, suggesting that it is new and valuable, capable of turning out a large amount of produce. When, however, the concern comes to be worked by a great number of poor and ignorant persons, who place their savings in undertakings of this kind, it is found out in a very short time that the whole affair is insolvent, and has been founded on the wreck and ruin of what was a former company. One expedient to check such proceedings which was suggested was this. It is that it should be compulsory on the companies to furnish something like a balance-sheet and account of their assets, and from time to time a re-valuation of their assets, so as to give information to those who are anxiously inquiring into the concern. A great difficulty, of course, exists in providing a balance-sheet which shall be applicable to every form of industry. Some balance-sheets would exhibit the particulars required in a form which would be perfectly intelligible if applied to one particular business, but if made compulsory upon all companies would be obviously unsatisfactory. We have thought it right, therefore, that provision should be made for making a balance-sheet compulsory and satisfactory to some Government Department—the Board of Trade, most naturally. Those were the general lines of the Bill, and I invite your Lordships to read it a first time.

Bill to amend the Companies Act, 1862 — Presented (The LORD CHANCELLOR).

LORD HERSCHELL: I am satisfied that an endeavour is about to be made to meet the evils to which the noble and learned Lord has referred. At the same time I think experience shows that it is easier to see what the disease is than to find out a remedy for it. However elaborate your amending provisions may be, it is possible that they may form an obstacle and an impediment to those whose enterprize we do not wish to hinder, while at the same time they will be walked round or walked through by the very persons whom it is our interest to shut out. A measure of this description depends entirely on the details. Whether the scheme is one which will meet with the approval of your Lordships I cannot of course say, but I do not feel that it is possible, after the statement just made, to go further now than to express my wish to give all the assistance I can in meeting the evils brought before the notice of your Lordships.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

UNITED TELEPHONE COMPANY BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Second Reading of the Bill be deferred until Monday next."

COLONEL MAKINS (Essex, S.W.) said, he had been told that if the Bill appeared upon the Paper that day there would be no doubt that it would be taken. He had given Notice of his intention to move the rejection of the Bill. He understood that the hon. Baronet whose name was on the back of the Bill was not able to be in his place, and on the distinct understanding that the Bill would be taken on Monday, or some arrangement made for a day on which it would be brought forward, he would not oppose the Motion for Adjournment.

Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

ARMS (IRELAND) ACT—MR. W. COTTER —REFUSAL OF LICENCE.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. William Cotter, of Breenymore, County Cork, was recommended for a gun licence by a local magistrate; and, why the licence was refused?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Sir, as I have already explained to the hon. Member, the licence was not recommended by a local magistrate resident in the neighbourhood. It was refused by the licensing officer in the exercise of his discretion.

MR. GILHOOLY: Upon what ground was it refused?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot go into the ground of refusal. The discretion rested with the licensing officer.

MR. GILHOOLY: Is he not responsible if he makes a mistake?

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DIS- MISSAL OF CONSTABLE DEANS.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) (for Mr. J. E. REDMOND) (Wexford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can state the reasons for the recent summary dismissal of Constable John S. Deans, who had served seven years and nine months in the Royal Irish Constabulary in County Clare, and for a period of three years had held confidential positions in the offices of District Inspectors Kidd, Wynne, and Teddal, to the satisfaction of these officers; whether, on the 18th of March last, Constable Deans was summoned to the County Inspector's office in the police barrack at Ennis, and questioned as to the fact that he had given evidence for the defence in the prosecution of the hon. Member for East Clare (Mr. Cox) under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; whether such evidence was of a purely technical character as to the posting of public notices in police huts; whether County Inspector Heard informed him that he had received a letter from Colonel Turner on the subject, and that he was now obliged to report to headquarters the fact of his (Constable Deans) having given such evidence on behalf of the hon. Member for East Clare; and, whether, without any further warning and without any other reasons having been assigned, Constable Deans was within a week afterwards summarily dismissed from the Royal Irish Constabulary?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The County Inspector of Constabulary reports that he did not question the man as to the fact alleged; that he did not inform him that he had a letter from Colonel Turner; nor did he say that he would have to report to headquarters the fact of his having given the evidence referred to. No special reason was assigned on the discharge of this man other than that his services were no longer required.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): If this man makes an affidavit before a magistrate as to the exact nature of the conversation that did take place, will the right hon. Gentleman take any further action in the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that any further action is required.

MR. W. REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman how it was that the Constabulary Authorities in Ireland only arrived at the conclusion that this man was unfit for service directly after he gave evidence for the hon. Member for East Clare?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not quite understand the purport of the hon. Member's Question.

MR. W. REDMOND: My Question is, whether, as a matter of fact, this man was not dismissed because he gave evidence in favour of the hon. Member for East Clare at his trial, and that nothing else has been alleged against him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member has been wrongfully informed.

MR. COX: I beg to give Notice that on the Police Estimates I will raise this Question.

POOR LAW REMOVALS—J. WATERS AND T. MORONEY.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that John Waters and Thomas Moroney, after a residence of 40 years in Cardiff, have been deported as paupers from a locality which for that long period was benefited by their labour and expenditure to Waterford, which place they originally were compelled to leave owing to want of employment; whether John Waters and Thomas Moroney have become a permanent charge on a Union to which is attachable the mere accident of birth; and, whether it is competent for Guardians of the poor in Ireland to send to the Unions in which they have been born paupers from England, Scotland, and Wales, who may be in receipt of Poor Law relief in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The facts are substantially as stated in the first two paragraphs. The reply to the third paragraph is in the negative.

MR. P. J. POWER asked, as this was a great grievance, if the right hon. Gentleman would be prepared to introduce a measure removing that grievance?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I suppose the Bill to which the hon. Gentleman refers would be a Bill which would enable Irish Unions to export to England poor Englishmen who, as it were, had to be supported out of Irish rates. Neither that nor any other Bill of the kind has a chance of passing this Session.

MR. P. J. POWER: May I ask—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The first Question of the hon. Gentleman did not fairly arise out of the Question on the Paper.

INLAND REVENUE—INCOME TAX— FOREIGN AND COLONIAL LOANS.

CAPTAIN SELWYN (Cambridge, Wisbeach) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is a fact that a Treasury Minute allows foreigners residing abroad to have their coupons of Foreign and Colonial Loans cashed in London free of income tax; whether the Board of Inland Revenue refuse the same privilege to British subjects permanently residing abroad, although the moneys are not derived from any source in Great Britain, but exclusively from foreign sources; and, whether, if such is the case, he will consider the advisability of extending to British subjects residing abroad the same privileges as those enjoyed by foreigners?

Mr. P. J. Power

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: Yes, Sir; the privilege spoken of by the hon. and gallant Member is allowed to foreigners residing abroad, and, I conceive, quite fairly. We have no right to tax foreigners as such, or to impose a duty on Foreign and Colonial Bonds as such where they are not held in this country. The accident that the coupons are payable here is not, I think, sufficient reason for taxing the foreigner who holds them abroad. But with British subjects the case is different, and I see no reason for extending this privilege to them. It by no means follows that because a British subject resides permanently abroad he ceases to have any concern in or to derive any advantage from the various objects for which taxation is imposed in this country. He profits by our Diplomatic and Consular services; and it is not exclusively those who live in this country who derive advantage from our expenditure on the Army and Navy, which again means taxation. I do not, therefore, think that the British subject resident abroad has a good claim to exemption from the small amount of Imperial taxation which he pays in this form.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTABLISHMENTS COMMISSION—ATTENDANTS, &c. AT THE SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, pending the inquiry of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service Establishments into the case of the attendants and messengers at the South Kensington Museum, the Rules relating to their sick pay, which had been in force for upwards of 20 years before their withdrawal by the Treasury Minute of 1885, might be allowed to apply to those attendants and messengers who entered the Office before that date, and who now, after long and meritorious service, find themselves subject to a much lower rate of sick pay?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The Treasury does not admit that the attendants and messengers are entitled to the privileges which they claim; and I do not think that, pending the inquiry of the Royal Commission on Civil Service Establishments, it would be advisable to make the concession indicated by the hon. Member.

WAR OFFICE—5TH BATTALION ROYAL SCOTCH FUSILIERS—MAJOR ROE.

Mr. TOMLINSON (Preston) (for Mr. DIXON - HARTLAND) (Middlesex, Uxbridge) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the officer commanding the 5th Battalion Royal Fusiliers, who is stated to have reported unfavourably upon Major Roe, is the commanding officer under whom he actually did the duty of major during the years 1886-7; and, if not, whether it is upon the adverse Report of an officer only recently appointed to the command that Major Roe is deprived of the step in rank to which he is properly entitled by long service; and, whether, assuming that Major Roe is not able to do duties which he has actually performed for three years, it is a fact that the remaining seven captains are so inefficient that none of them are fit for promotion, although the drill and discipline of the battalion has been reported to be in the highest state of efficiency up to the date of the honourable Charles Edgecumbe's resignation of the command in 1887?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The selection of officers for promotion is made by the Commander-in-Chief, on information which appears to him to be proper for his guidance, after careful consideration. As I have already stated, in the opinion of the officers commanding the battalion, the officers commanding the Regimental District, and the General Officer commanding the District, it would not be for the good of the Service to promote Major Roe. No decision has yet been come to as to how the vacancy shall be filled.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASS—COSTERMONGERS' DWELLINGS—ST. LUKE'S.

Mr. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) asked the hon. Member for the Knutsford Division of Cheshire, Whether the Metropolitan Board of Works has granted a site in the parish of St. Luke's for costermongers' dwellings; and, if so, what are the terms upon which it has been granted?

Mr. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): The Board has sold to a committee of costermongers a plot of ground on the south side of Dufferin Street, in the parish of St. Luke's for costermongers' dwellings. The ground was sold for 21 years' purchase, at a rent computed at 1d. a foot, and on condition that the ground should be used for the erection of costermongers' dwellings.

WAR OFFICE—ARMY ACCOUTREMENTS—THE 3RD BEDFORD REGIMENT.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the new valises supplied to the 3rd Bedford Regiment in the autumn of 1885 have been officially reported as unserviceable; whether, by Regulation, these 870 valises should have lasted for 20 trainings, whereas they have only been in wear three trainings; whether, besides being reported unserviceable, the paint has dropped off and ruined the men's coats; and, who is the officer responsible for passing these valises, and the name of the contractor?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Report of a Board of Officers stating that the valises of the 3rd Bedford Regiment were "not waterproof and therefore unserviceable" was received at the War Office this morning. This is the first Official Report that has been received on this subject. Nothing is said in it about damage to the men's coats. Valises should last the Militia 20 years; but those referred to in this Question were of a new kind, and their issue was of an experimental character. Until some of them have been received and examined I cannot say anything more about them.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON: But who was the contractor?

Mr. E. STANHOPE: How in the world can my hon. Friend expect me to tell him this until I have read the Report, which was only received this morning? I must have time to examine the Report.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—THE EXPENDITURE.

Mr. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the recent evidence given before the Royal Commission on the Metropolitan Board of Works, he can suggest any method of limiting their powers as to expenditure of ratepayers' money during the existence of their present functions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): No, Sir; I am unable to suggest any method of limiting the existing statutory powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I apprehend that the legality of any expenditure of public money by the Board can be called in question before the Auditor on the complaint of a ratepayer.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE
(IRELAND) ACT, 1887—EVIDENCE ON CHARGES OF CONSPIRACY.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can assure the House that, in every case where an individual has been convicted under "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," of conspiracy to compel or induce some person not to deal with or work for some other person in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation, evidence has been taken to prove not only the refusal of the individual to work or deal as above, but to prove that he was implicated in a conspiracy for some one of the said purposes?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): In all the cases described by the right hon. Gentleman evidence has been taken to prove the conspiracy referred to. In one case, that of Sullivan, the evidence so tendered did not appear to the Court of Exchequer to be of a character to prove the offence of criminal conspiracy. This arose from an error, not of substance, but of procedure, in the Court of First Instance; where evidence implicating five men in the charge of criminal conspiracy, though given in Court, was not, as it should have been, entered separately against each of the defendants.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am afraid that some misapprehension has arisen between us as to the meaning of my Question. Is it not the fact that evidence of conspiracy was not given, but simply of refusal to deal with particular cases? But I shall bring the matter to an issue by asking the right hon. Gentleman, not to-day, but I will put the Question down for to-morrow or Monday, whichever he may think best—Whether, in the case of Thomas Bailey, who was convicted on the 31st of May, at Castlemartyr, of conspiracy, and sentenced by Resident Magistrates—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman; but there is a Rule of the House against giving Notice in this way.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I beg pardon. I will give Notice for Monday.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): May I ask the Chief Secretary whether, as a matter of fact, the only evidence of conspiracy in any single case has been the evidence of the refusal of the person prosecuted to supply the goods?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that is not so; but if the hon. Gentleman will put a Question on the Paper, I will be in a position to answer him.

MR. CLANCY: Most decidedly I will.

(IRELAND) ACT, 1887—CHARGES OF CONSPIRACY.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether, in cases of conspiracy under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, it is compulsory on the Magistrates to state a case if required? Perhaps I may be allowed to mention that the Question has been altered since I sent it in, and words have been left out showing that I put the Question because of certain language held by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. J. Balfour).

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The reason why the Question was altered was that it asked one Minister if what another Minister had stated on the previous day was true. Therefore, there was something invidious—or it might be taken to be invidious—in the form of the Question.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): Yes, Sir; the statement is perfectly correct. The Justices are bound by statute to state a case on the application of any person dissatisfied with their decision as being erroneous in point of law, unless they are of opinion that the application is merely frivolous; and their judgment as to this latter matter is liable to be controlled by the Queen's Bench Division, which may order them to state a case.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): May I ask the Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether, as a matter of fact, the magistrates did not refuse to state a case in the case of Brosnan, the news vendor, of Tralee, not on the ground that it was frivolous; and also in the case of the Kerry blacksmith; and may I ask, also, whether the then Solicitor General for Ireland did not, before the Court of Queen's Bench, oppose those applications?

MR. MADDEN: I am not aware of the facts of the particular cases to which the hon. Gentleman alludes; but if he wishes to get more specific information as to either case, I shall be prepared, if he gives Notice, to answer him. The Question was addressed to me as to the law, and I stated the statutory requirements; but if the hon. Member wishes information as to particular facts I will give it to him on Notice being given.

MR. CLANCY: May I ask, whether there is a single case in which magistrates have refused to state a case on the ground that the application was frivolous?

MR. MADDEN: I must request the hon. Gentleman, if he asks me a Question on a matter of fact, to put it on the Paper.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Arising out of the Questions put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne, I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, of which I have given him private Notice, Whether it is a fact that out of the 58 Resident Magistrates who have tried cases under the Crimes Act, including cases of conspiracy, 12 only have been called to the Bar, and of these 12 how many have been practising barristers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I wholly fail to see how the Question arises from the Questions put on the Paper, and the Question itself has only been put into my hands five minutes ago. I believe, as a matter of fact, the hon. Gentleman will find most of the information which he requires in the Return already laid before Parliament with regard to Resident Magistrates. If that Return does not give all the information, I will be happy to give it to him if he gives Notice.

MR. MAC NEILL: I will.

INDIA—FRONTIER DEFENCES— RUMOURED LOAN.

MR. SLAGG (Burnley) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true, as stated in The Times, that the Government of India contemplate the raising of a special loan to meet the cost of the Frontier defences?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Government of India do not propose to raise a special loan in order to meet the cost of the Frontier defences. It has been decided not to impose taxation for this purpose, and hence the Financial Statement shows a deficit in the Budget for 1888-9; but the charge can, according to the Estimate, be met from the cash balances.

MR. SLAGG: Then the statement in The Times is incorrect?

SIR JOHN GORST: I have not seen the statement in The Times.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—

“SMYTH v. MADDEN AND CURREY.”

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What was the certificate given by the Recorder of Dublin to Constable Currey, of the F Division, Dublin Metropolitan Police, on the occasion of the trial of the action “Smyth v. Madden and Currey” at the Quarter Sessions held on April 15, 1887, at Kingstown; also the amount of the costs paid by the Crown for the defendant Currey; and, whether the nominal verdict of 10s. and the fee to the jury is included therein?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Commissioner of Police informs me that the costs referred to amounted to £13 6s. 10d., which included the sum of 10s. 6d. awarded as damages, and afterwards, by direction of the Recorder, given to the jury. With regard to the certi-ificate, I am informed that application has already been made for a copy of it, with a view to its use in private litigation, and that it has been refused. On these grounds, and under these circumstances, I do not think I should state the terms of the certificate on official authority here.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): Under what Act of Parliament are those costs paid by the Crown?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman must put that Question on the Paper.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—KILLARNEY PETTY SESSIONS—CHARGE AGAINST CONSTABLE KEARNEY.

MR. SHEEHAN (Kerry, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether at Killarney Petty Sessions, on the 5th instant, on the hearing of a charge of assault against Constable Kearney, the complainant, Timothy Cronin, and four witnesses, deposed to the constable having struck Cronin, and pushed him off the flag-way, for no apparent reason; whether the presiding Justices, Messrs. Herbert and Orpen, while avowing there was no obstruction of the foot-way by Cronin, still dismissed the case against the constable, without requiring his solicitor to make any defence, on the sole ground that they considered the assault trivial; and, if these allegations are true, would he cause the re-hearing of this case?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Inspector General reports that the complainant and three witnesses did not depose to the constable having struck Cronin; but they did swear to his having pushed him off the foot-path. Cronin, however, admitted that he did not feel the assault. The magistrates considered that there had been no real assault, and dismissed the case. The charge against Cronin was not heard before the magistrates at Petty Sessions, but before the Town Court.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) asked whether, when the case was before the Petty Sessions, a previous case had not been before the Town Court, and that, at the instance of the policeman, a summons was served for obstruction of the foot-path; and, whether the magistrates did not admit that the assault had been committed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the facts were as he had already stated.

MR. SHEEHAN (Kerry, E.): Does the right hon. Gentleman say that the charge against the sergeant was not heard at Petty Sessions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had stated the information he had received. If the hon. Gentleman would put a Question on the Paper he would inquire.

MR. SHEEHAN said, he would repeat the Question on Friday.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—PROCEEDINGS AT LANESBOROUGH.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to a report in The Freeman's Journal of June 6, of the proceedings of a Special Court held at Lanesborough, under the provisions of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, for the trial of prisoners on a charge of intimidation, in which evidence was given by a sergeant of police that he saw the local band drumming before the gate of a Mr. Russell, which was a sign that he was Boycotted; whether it is true, as stated in the report, that Mr. Hill, one of the Resident Magistrates who composed the Court, threatened the prisoners and everyone listening to him that if there were any more drumming at these places, or at evictions, or at Courts, he would have their drums smashed, and every man present sent to gaol for six months; in making use of this threat from the Bench, was Mr. Hill acting in his judicial capacity as a magistrate, or as an agent of the Executive Government; and, is Mr. Hill one of the Resident Magistrates who have been in attendance on the Chief Secretary in Dublin Castle.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Resident Magistrate reports that the band referred to had, on the occasion of evictions and trials at Petty Sessions, collected disorderly crowds, which interfered with the administration of the law; and he took the first opportunity which was presented by the occasion in question of warning them against continuing their course, and the probable consequences which would ensue should they disregard this warning. He gave this warning advice in his judicial capacity, not as a threat.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—APPLICATIONS FOR FAIR RENTS—CO. ANTRIM.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) (for Mr. M'CARTAN) (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can state how many applications to fix fair rent in the County of Antrim were remaining unheard on the 1st instant; how many of these applications are from the Poor Law Union of Ballycastle; when a sitting was last held to hear applications from this Union; on what date, and in what town, the first sitting of a Sub-Commission will be held for the County of Antrim; and, whether he can give the names of the gentlemen who will constitute the Sub-Commission?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me that 2,057 cases remained unheard on the 1st instant, of which 378 were from the Union of Ballycastle. The date of the last sitting at which cases from the Ballycastle Union were heard was July, 1887. The Commissioners are not in a position to state the date at which the next sitting for cases from the Ballycastle Union will be held; nor can they at present say the names of the gentlemen who will constitute the Sub-Commission. The place of sitting will be Ballycastle. I answered the Question only a few days ago.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BALLYMENA BOARD OF GUARDIANS—COLONEL STUDDERT.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) (for Mr. M'CARTAN) (Down, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a Resolution of the Board of Guardians at Ballymena, County Antrim, on the 2nd instant, expressing want of confidence in Colonel Studdert, the Local Government Board auditor, and requesting that another auditor should be sent down there instead; whether Colonel Studdert had publicly certified that the sureties of Relieving Officer Duffin were alive, and whether he had since written to the Board of Guardians on Saturday last to know if these sureties were alive; whether he can state if these sureties are dead or alive; and, if dead, the dates of their deaths, and also the date of the last certificate in which this auditor certified that they were living; whether the Guardians telegraphed to the Local Government Board on Saturday last, calling for a new auditor to be sent down to them; whether a new auditor will be sent there, and if he can give the name of the new auditor; and, whether Colonel Studdert is the same gentleman who audited last year, and for some years past, the accounts of the Belfast Town Council?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Local Government Board would not be prepared to take so serious a step as the supersession of an auditor upon the vague grounds suggested by the Ballymena Guardians; but they have asked the Guardians to state the specific grounds upon which they base their complaint of careless audit, and they are willing to investigate the matter, if the Guardians are prepared to substantiate their charges. With regard to the case of the Relieving Officer Duffin, it appears that the auditor was misled by false information given to him by the late clerk of the Union (who has become a defaulter), and who reported to him, at successive audits, that the man's sureties were living, notwithstanding that they had been dead for some years. The answer to the last paragraph is, Yes.

CRIMINAL LAW—RELEASE OF ALBERT TRAVIS, CONVICTED OF MURDER.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as reported in the papers of Tuesday, that Albert Travis, sentenced to death in 1886, has been proved to be innocent of the crime of which he was convicted; whether it is true that he has been unconditionally released; and, if so, whether the Government intend to compensate him for his unmerited imprisonment; and, whether it is true, as reported, that the police at the time of the trial had information in their possession showing that Travis was not guilty?

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford) also asked, Whether, as stated in The Pall Mall Gazette of Tuesday, it is true an unconditional release of the convict Albert Travis has been made, and on what grounds; whether it is true, as also stated, that at the time of trial the police knew that Travis did not commit the murder; and, whether the release is due to reconsideration of the same papers in the Home Office at the time of the commutation of the capital punishment?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.) It is true that the remainder of the sentence on Albert Travis of penal servitude for life on a charge of murder has been remitted after two years, on the ground that there is too much doubt in the case to justify his further detention in prison. There is no intention to grant him any compensation. It is not a fact that at the time of the trial the police knew that Travis did not commit the murder, or that they had information in their possession showing that he was not guilty. Since the commutation of the sentence of death fresh information has been received, which has led me on two occasions to reconsider the whole of this most intricate and singular case. I arrived at my final decision after consulting more than one eminent Judge, from whom I have received valuable assistance. The difficulties of the case are shown by the fact that the learned Judge who tried the case is still satisfied with the verdict.

MR. W. REDMOND: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to a statement made by Major Barker, Chief Constable of Birkenhead, to the effect that it was known to the Police Authorities, after the case had been fully investigated before the Justices, that Travis did not commit the murder, and that it was against the judgment of the Police Authorities that a prosecution was instituted at the Assizes?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not seen that statement, nor am I aware that it is authentic. As far as I know, the only matter in the knowledge of the police that did not come out at the trial was evidence which the police have since laid before me, contradicting unexpected statements of a woman named Platt.

Mr. W. Redmond

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Rule is still observed by which, in all cases of capital charges, the prosecution shall be under the direct control of the Public Prosecutor?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not aware of any case in which that Rule has not been observed; but, off-hand, without searching for documents at the Home Office, I should be sorry to say positively that the Rule has always been observed. The Public Prosecutor is directly responsible for such cases, although, in many instances, he has employed local agents as his representatives.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked, whether it was not usual in cases where a man had suffered unmerited imprisonment, to give him compensation?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; on the contrary, to give compensation is without precedent.

MR. O'HEA (Donegal, W.) asked, if it was not a fact that compensation was given to a man named Habron, whose case stood on exactly parallel lines with the present one?

MR. MATTHEWS: I would like Notice of that Question.

MUNICIPAL BOROUGHS (IRELAND)— BALLINASLOE.

MR. HARRIS (Galway, E) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the inhabitants of Ballinasloe suffer great inconvenience for want of a Town Hall that could be used as a place for the transaction of public business; that there are two halls in the town—namely, the Agricultural Hall and the Farming Society Building, both of which were erected for public uses and in a great degree by public money, but have now passed into the hands of the ground landlords, who have rented them to private individuals; and, whether he is aware that the Town Commissioners have been unable to secure the Agricultural Hall as a Town Hall, though they offered to give the same rent for it as is paid at present; and, if so, would the Local Government Board, by their advice or otherwise, aid the townspeople of Ballinasloe in their legal efforts to get possession of this hall? The hon. Gentleman also asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that in the most central position in Ballinasloe there are sheds which are used as slaughter-houses, which emit a most offensive odour, dangerous to the health of the town; that the inhabitants of Ballinasloe and the Town Commissioners signed a requisition asking Lord Clancarty to remove those sheds, on the ground that they were a public nuisance, an impediment to the traffic, and a disfigurement to the town; that his Lordship refused, on the ground that they were a market house, in which his family had a vested interest of such a nature that he had no legal right to disturb it, especially as it had relation to the tolls and customs; and, if so, would the Local Government Board interfere and cause the removal of these sheds, and thus prevent the expense of a law suit?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, that these Questions required local inquiry, and he would, therefore, ask the hon. Member to postpone them until Tuesday.

Mr. HARRIS: I shall be engaged next Tuesday at the Law Courts.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, he might put down the Questions for Monday; but he could not promise to be in a position to answer them by that day.

MUNICIPAL BOROUGH (IRELAND)— TOLLS AND CUSTOMS OF BALLINASLOE.

Mr. HARRIS (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the tolls and customs of Ballinasloe, which, owing to the great fairs held in that town, come to a large amount of money, are paid to Lord Clancarty; that, out of the money thus received, his Lordship contributes nothing towards the cleansing, lighting, or other municipal expenses of the town; and, if so, will the Government give an instruction to the Royal Commission on Market Rights and Tolls to hold a public inquiry in Ballinasloe?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have no knowledge as to the matters of fact referred to. I understand that Ballinasloe is one of the towns selected by the Royal Commission at which a public inquiry will be held by the Assistant Commissioners for Ireland in due course.

MERCHANDIZE MARKS ACT, 1887— SEC. 3, SUB-SEC. 2.

Mr. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether Section 3, Sub-section 2, of "The Merchandize Marks Act, 1887," is intended to apply to domestic as well as to foreign manufacturers; and, whether, under Section 2, a man would be liable to imprisonment who sold goods of British manufacture, bearing his name, but not actually manufactured by him?

THE PRESIDENT (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BAUGH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said: The hon. Member asks me to place an interpretation on an Act of Parliament. I have no power to do so. I am not, however, aware of any such limitation of the application of Sub-section 2 of Section 3 of the Merchandize Marks Act as he alludes to in the first part of his Question. With reference to the second part, I would call the hon. Member's attention to the words "or merchandize" in the last line of the sub-section, which were, I understand, inserted to meet the contingency referred to.

COAL MINES—COLLIERY ACCIDENT AT UDSTON, LANARKSHIRE.

Mr. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.) (for Mr. PHILLIPS) (Lanark, Mid) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will lay upon the Table the Minutes of Evidence taken before the Udston Colliery Inquiry?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): If the hon. Member will refer to pages 10 to 14 of the Report he will see that they contain an abstract of the evidence given by the principal witnesses, both as to the facts and the causes of the explosion. Under these circumstances, I hope the hon. Member will not press me to incur the serious expense of printing a verbatim copy of the evidence, which is very bulky. I shall be happy to show it to the hon. Member.

BRITISH GUIANA—THE SILVER CUR- RENCY.

Mr. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether representations have been received from British Guiana with reference to the worn-out condition of the silver currency in use throughout the Colony; and, if not, whether, in the event of such representations being made, the Government will favourably consider the question?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Secretary of State has received no official representations on the subject; but the Colonial Government have the remedy in their own hands, as arrangements were made by the Treasury in 1879 by which new coin would be shipped to any Colony using British currency free of charge. The Imperial Treasury will also pay the full nominal value of all worn British silver sent in to the Mint.

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)—
MEDWAY UNION WORKHOUSE — CASE OF THOMAS WARD.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he can now state the result of his inquiries into the case of Thomas Ward, a pauper inmate in the Medway Union Workhouse?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have made inquiry respecting Thomas Ward, an inmate of the workhouse of the Medway Union. He was allowed leave of absence from the workhouse on the 1st of November last. He returned about 8 o'clock and went to his ward. He was while there drunk and disorderly, causing a great disturbance, swearing and using bad language. The circumstances were reported to the House Committee the next day; and they, having examined several of the men in the ward and ascertained the facts, directed that he should be charged before the magistrates. He was accordingly, on the following day, given in charge of the police. Before leaving the workhouse he was requested to change the workhouse clothing for his own; but he refused to do so, and the clothing was forcibly changed. This took place at 12.30 in the daytime, and not at 12.30 at night, as suggested. Ward was charged before the Justices, was convicted, and sentenced to 21 days' imprisonment with hard labour. The wife of Ward died in the infirmary in March, 1886, having been an inmate for many years. Ward was with her till late in the evening, the matron having given permission that he should visit his wife at any time during the day until 8 o'clock, and he had been continually in the infirmary. As there were 21 other patients in the ward, the matron did not feel justified in allowing a male visitor after 8 o'clock. Ward was informed of his wife's death early in the morning. It does not appear to me that any further inquiry as to the management of the workhouse is necessary.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY — IN-TERFERENCE WITH NEWSVENDORS AT CORK.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that the following cases of police interference with, and intimidation of, street newspaper vendors have occurred in the City of Cork—namely, Denis Desmond (young lad), who refused to sell to a policeman a copy of United Ireland, arrested by Sergeant Kennedy, and detained for a short time in Bridewell; Denis M'Carthy (young lad), refused to sell a copy of The Cork Examiner to Police Sergeant Power, arrested by Sergeant Power, taken to the Bridewell, and detained there for some time; John Radley (young lad), refused to sell a copy of United Ireland and Cork Examiner to policeman, arrested by Sergeant Power, taken to Bridewell, and detained there for some time; Cornelius Coakley (young lad), arrested for refusing to sell to policeman a copy of United Ireland and Cork Examiner, by Sergeant Power, taken to the Bridewell, and detained there for some time; Patrick Bradley (young lad), arrested under circumstances similar to the above by Sergeant Power; Patrick Carleton (young lad), refused to sell a copy of Cork Herald to policeman, arrested by Sergeant O'Leary, and lodged in Bridewell for some time; Michael Murphy (an old man of 70), he refused to sell a copy of The Examiner to policeman on beat, and the policeman kicked the old man's box about, scattered his papers, cuffed the old man, and warned him against selling the newspaper; and, whether, in view of these occurrences he will order an independent inquiry into these matters?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Sir, I am making special inquiries into the cases; and if the hon. Member will put the Questions on Tuesday next I will try to give him an answer.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked whether, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary made his speech at Battersea on the 16th of May, he was unaware of the circumstances there detailed, which took place in December last.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It has yet to be proved that the circumstances did take place.

EGYPT—RAILWAY BETWEEN WADY HALFA AND SARRAS.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe) asked the Secretary of State for War, What is the present position of the railway (of about 100 miles in length, between Wady Halfa and Sarras, in Egypt) constructed by War Departments at a cost of about £140,000; who is in control; is the railway worked or abandoned; and, what has become of the rolling stock provided for it?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire) (Horncastle): The hon. Baronet is under some misapprehension as to this line of railway from Wady Halfa to Sarras. It is only 33½ miles in length, and was constructed by the Egyptian Government between 1873 and 1877. At the time of the Nile Expedition, and for military purposes, some expenditure was incurred in improving the line; but nothing approaching the sum named in the Question. On the abandonment of the country south of Wady Halfa the line was transferred to the control of the Egyptian Government, to whom the rolling stock was lent, so far as it had been provided from British funds. The sale of the stock is now under consideration.

COAL MINES — EXPLOSIONS — EVIDENCE BEFORE THE CORONERS' JURIES—THE ST. HELEN'S EXPLOSION.

MR. W. CRAWFORD (Durham, Mid) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he is aware that some of his Predecessors have had printed and issued a verbatim report of the minutes of evidence taken before Coroners' Courts in cases of explosions in mines; if he is aware that in the case of Seaham, in the County of Durham, where 168 lives were lost, and the inquest lasted 12 days, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) had printed in a Blue Book a full report of all the evidence taken before the Coroner and jury, although the workmen had not, or ever did attribute negligence as the cause of the disaster; if he knows that in the case of the explosion at St. Helen's Colliery, in Cumberland, the workmen do allege negligence of management as the direct cause of so many lives being lost, and that they contemplate taking legal action under the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act to recover compensation for the relatives of the deceased; and, whether, under these exceptional circumstances, he will order a verbatim report of the evidence tendered before the Coroner's Court or Courts in the St. Helen's inquiry?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The answer to the first Question is in the affirmative. I am not aware that the men allege negligence of management as the direct cause of loss of life, or that they contemplate taking legal action. I am unable to lay a verbatim report of the evidence upon the Table, as there was no shorthand writer present at the Coroner's inquest; but the Report which I have just received and will shortly lay on the Table of the House specifically refers to the important witnesses, and to the facts to which they deposed.

COAL MINES, &c. REGULATION ACT 1887—SPECIAL RULES.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received from the Leicestershire district objections to Special Rules; and, whether he intends to take any steps to see that the wishes of the workmen are duly and properly attended to?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I have received such objections. With the view of meeting the wishes of the workmen in this district certain amendments of the Special Rule were prepared by the Inspector, approved by me, and proposed to the owners, by whom they have generally been accepted.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—COLLECTION OF MONEY IN SOUTHWARK PARK.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the fact that a summons has been served on a Mr. Fairbairn for collecting money after a political speech in Southwark Park; and, if this is the first summons that has been served under this bye-law of the Metropolitan Board of Works?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I am informed by the Metropolitan Board of Works that the fact is as stated. Mr. Fairbairn is the first person who has broken the bye-law, and, consequently, he is the first person who has been summoned under it.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM: Seeing that the Government apparently are about to suppress political meetings in London under pretexts, had we better not pass a Coercion Act for London, as for Ireland?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Mr. Fenwick.

POST OFFICE (CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE)—PAYMENT OF SALARIES.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will give the staff of the Central Telegraph Office an opportunity of expressing their wishes as to the present system of payment of salaries, in the same manner as was done recently on the question of long and short duties; and, whether, if a large number of the staff are found to be in favour of weekly, instead of fortnightly, payment of wages, he will take steps to comply with their request?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University), in reply, said, that any officer in the Post Office was at liberty to apply to him through the usual official channel; and should the staff at the Central Telegraph Office submit an application he would give it attentive consideration. It would, of course, be premature to give any promise as to future action until the requirements of the Service and the wishes of the officers had received fuller consideration.

POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND)—SORTING VANS BETWEEN BURNTISLAND AND DUNDEE.

MR. PRESTON BRUCE (Fifeshire, W.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to the discontinuance at the beginning of this month of the sorting van, which for the last two or three years has been running between Burntisland and Dundee, and which has proved to be a very great public convenience in respect to the interchange of letters locally in the County of Fife; whether the discontinuance of this van is the act of the North British Railway Company, and connected with differences between that Company and the Post Office, now the subject of arbitration; whether the Post Office has made any attempt to arrange temporarily for the continuance of this van, so as to obviate the derangement and delay of mails which must result from its suspension; and, whether, failing agreement, he has power to compel, and will compel, the Company to restore this sorting van?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The facts generally are as stated by the hon. Member. The Post Office did attempt, but unsuccessfully, to arrange for the continuance of the sorting carriages in Fifeshire. Until the umpire in the pending arbitration has made his award, I shall not be prepared to re-enter on the consideration of this Question. I believe the last sitting of the umpire and arbitrators is fixed for the latter part of this week, so we may hope before long to have the award.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—SEC. 1—STATE OF DUBLIN COUNTY.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been directed to the following extract from the report in The Freeman's Journal of the charge of Mr. Justice Johnson, on the 5th instant, to the Grand Jury of the County of Dublin:—

“The County Inspector had furnished him with a list of the criminal offences that had occurred since the last commission, and he reported that the county was in a perfectly satisfactory state;”

and, whether the Report of the County

Inspector referred to correctly represents the state of Dublin County as regards crime; and, if so, what is the reason for applying to the County of Dublin the 1st section of "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887?"

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The general state of crime is not abnormal. But I would remind the hon. Member that the section cannot be put in force unless a crime has been committed; and, further, that the necessity for using the section does not depend on the amount of crime committed, but on the character and circumstances of the crime which has to be investigated. The Government desire to be in a position to put the section in force without delay if the necessity for it should arise.

MR. CLANCY asked, if he was to understand that the reason why this section had been applied to the County of Dublin was that possibly something in the way of crime might arise in future requiring the aid of the section?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman must not be too hasty in his inferences.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can now explain to the House why this provision of the Crimes Act has been applied to the City of Dublin, when, since it was applied to the City of Dublin four weeks ago, no steps have been taken under the section? Now, as I think its application to the City of Dublin is extremely unnecessary, I think we are entitled to some explanation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was applied to the City of Dublin as included in the County; and my answer as regards the City of Dublin is precisely the same as the answer to the hon. Gentleman in relation to the County of Dublin.

MR. DILLON: I beg to point out that the right hon. Gentleman has given absolutely no answer to the Questions put to him. The right hon. Gentleman has given a purely hypothetical statement that possibly the Government might require the power of the section in case necessity might arise. I think we have a right to press the right hon. Gentleman for some statement of the reasons why the County and the City of Dublin are included under this section; because we are entitled to suppose that the Coercion Act would not be applied without some reason for it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that I can give the hon. Gentleman the information he desires; but I may say that the County of Dublin is in an exceptional position in Ireland, as offences might be committed there which would blossom into crimes in other parts of the country.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's) asked, whether the object of this section of the Crimes Act was not to discover crime; and whether Mr. Justice Johnson, on the same occasion, did not say that the amount of crime in the City of Dublin was very inconsiderable?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already told the hon. Gentleman that the necessity for using the powers of the section does not depend on the amount, but on the character and circumstances of the crime which has to be investigated.

MR. DILLON: But what is the crime? Will the right hon. Gentleman say that there is any crime in the City or County of Dublin of such a character as requires to be investigated under Section 1?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I should not be able to satisfy the hon. Gentleman with any answer I might give. I have nothing to add to what I have said.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman, by a plain answer, enable the House to understand, with regard to the County of Dublin, whether or not any information has been sworn that a crime has been committed; or whether, in fact, any crime has been committed which renders it desirable, in the opinion of the Government, to apply the provisions of Section 1 of the Coercion Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, the hon. Gentleman is aware that if information had been sworn that a crime had been committed there would be an investigation under Section 1. I am afraid beyond that I have nothing to add.

MR. CLANCY: Are we to understand, then, that no crime has been committed in the County of Dublin?

[No reply.]

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—JOHN MAGUIRE.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether John Maguire, of Swords, County of Dublin, against whom a warrant for arrest was issued for the second time early in March last, but who still remained at large at the end of April under the protection of the police, has yet been committed to prison; if so, when was Maguire arrested; and, what is the justification for delaying the execution of the warrant?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Maguire was arrested on the 10th of May. The execution of the warrant was delayed pending the result of inquiry by the Lord Lieutenant into a Memorial by Maguire. The magistrates ordered that the arrest should not take place until the Lord Lieutenant gave his decision on the Memorial.

MR. CLANCY: May I ask, is there any precedent for delaying the execution of a warrant on such grounds?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot answer that Question without Notice.

Subsequently,

MR. CLANCY said, as he did not hear the answer—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must call the attention of the House to the practice, which is a growing one, after the Questions have been twice gone over, of Members reviving Questions which have been answered some time ago, and raising a series of further Questions upon them. I think that practice is causing serious inconvenience to the House.

MR. CLANCY: With your permission, Sir, I may state that I was about saying that I had not heard the answer of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is hardly a reason, under the circumstances, for repeating the Question.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND) — RETURN OF CARETAKERS.

MR. A. E. PEASE (York) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When the Return of Caretakers evicted in Ireland, promised in February, and stated subsequently to be almost ready for presentation, will be placed upon the Table of the House?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The

Return was presented on May 31, and circulated this morning.

MR. A. E. PEASE asked, whether that Return was not one that dealt solely with evicted tenants—tenants reduced to the position of caretakers under Clause 7 of the Land Act; and, whether it was not a different Return to that which the right hon. Gentleman promised in February last?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the hon. Gentleman was under a misapprehension. The Return in question did deal with caretakers.

MR. A. E. PEASE: Not with the eviction of caretakers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir. If the hon. Gentleman will look at the Return, he will see, on the first and second pages of it, that it does refer to the eviction of caretakers—of ex-tenants who are caretakers.

MINES—CERTIFICATES OF UNDER MANAGERS.

MR. BURT (Morpeth) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to complaints that persons who have acted as under managers of mines for many years have been refused certificates of service; whether it is true that in cases of refusal to grant such certificates no reason or explanation has been given to the applicant; and, whether, considering the dissatisfaction that exists and the interest that is taken in the subject, he will state the method of procedure and the principles that guide the Home Office in dealing with certificates of service?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I have received such complaints. In the first instance no reason for refusal is given; but if remonstrance is made the reasons are set forth in detail. I consider my duty to be limited to ascertaining whether the candidate possesses the statutory qualification—namely, whether he has exercised functions substantially corresponding to those of an under manager. I have no right to exercise any discretion as to whether the candidate is otherwise personally qualified. The method of procedure is to refer each application to the Inspector of the district, who reports to me whether, in fact, the candidate possesses the statutory qualification.

Mr. Clancy

The two main principles, speaking generally, by which I have been guided are—first, that the applicant shall have been next in authority to a certificated manager; and, secondly, that he shall have exercised control over a separate mine, or such part as might, under the Statute, have constituted a separate mine.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)— ARREST OF JOHN MARA.

MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If a man named John Mara, a printer, was arrested on June 2, in Hyde Park, by two detectives, on suspicion of being a pickpocket; if at the time of his arrest he was dressed in his working clothes, his hands being covered with printer's ink, with other marks of his trade to show that he was what he represented himself to be; if he stated at the Police Court that he has been employed by Mr. T. Sharp, 17, Great Titchfield Street, W., for the last 10 years, whose foreman has been to Marlborough Street Police Court to testify to his good character and respectability and to offer bail; if this bail was refused by Mr. Newton; and, if so, for what reason; if John Mara is under further remand till Saturday next, to enable the police to bring forward witnesses who "saw him walking about in a suspicious manner;" if, as the matter stands at present, John Mara remains in prison on suspicion only, the only charge against him being the unsupported evidence of two detectives; and, if he will at once order John Mara's release on bail?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the magistrate that the facts as stated in the Question are substantially correct, and that the prisoner is under remand on the evidence of two reliable witnesses, while other witnesses are to be produced on Saturday. I have no authority to order his release on bail.

MR. CAINE: Does it require a fortnight for two detectives to produce corroborative evidence of picking pockets in Hyde Park; and is there anything beyond the suspicion of those detectives that this man was engaged in picking pockets?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have given the hon. Gentleman all the information that I possess.

MR. CAINE: Well, I shall put down other Questions on this subject to-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL — THE LICENSING CLAUSES—THE COUNTY COUNCILS.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he intends to persevere with the proposal to hand over to the County Councils the proceeds of the licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors?

THE PRESIDENT (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): We do not intend, Sir, to make any alteration in our proposals in this regard.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—THE READING ROOM.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he will place some additional furniture in the Reading Room, so that the newspapers may be arranged in a convenient and available manner for the use of the Members of the House?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (MR. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): Yes, Sir; I will endeavour to see whether better arrangements cannot be made in the Reading Room.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) asked, whether it might not be possible to get a better newspaper room altogether; and, also, whether the First Commissioner could not cause a more adequate supply of newspapers, particularly French and Belgian newspapers, to be procured?

MR. PLUNKET: The supply of newspapers does not come within my Department. I should like to see a better Reading Room; but I am afraid it is not possible to obtain one, considering the accommodation of the building.

WAR OFFICE (AUXILIARY FORCES)— THE YEOMANRY—LIMITATION OF AGE.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON (Devon, Tavistock) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will extend to the Yeomanry the Order recently issued to the Volunteers, which limits the age for service in that Force to the years between 17 and 50?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It is proposed to fix a limit of age for service in the Yeomanry, subject to exceptions in very special cases.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—REFUSAL TO GIVE EVIDENCE.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following in The Daily News :—

“At Falcarragh Crimes Court yesterday four prisoners were remanded for the fourth time to Derry Gaol for seven days for refusing to give evidence. An old man named Shane O'Donnell fainted on his third journey from gaol. He was with great difficulty resuscitated, and was eventually discharged.”

how long has this old man O'Donnell been in prison altogether; and, has he been charged with or convicted of any crime?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, that the Question only appeared on the Paper that morning; but if it were repeated on Monday he would endeavour to answer it.

UNITED STATES—SHIPPING CHARGES—DECLARATION FEE.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has yet received an answer from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington as to the reason why shippers from England to the United States are charged a declaration fee of 2s. 6d. on each invoice in addition to the Consul's fee, while shippers from Germany to the United States pay no declaration fee?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham) (who replied) said: A letter containing the substance of the Report on the subject received from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington was addressed to the hon. Member yesterday. If he requires any further information I would suggest that he should communicate again with the Foreign Office, where the matter is receiving attention.

Viscount Ebrington

VENEZUELA—DUTIES AD VALOREM.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) (for Mr. WATT) (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the additional 30 per cent ad valorem duty upon all goods imported is still enforced by Venezuela; and, whether it is a fact that the trade between Trinidad and Venezuela has now virtually ceased to exist?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham) (who replied) said: We have no information that this additional duty has ceased to be levied. It is not a fact that trade between Trinidad and Venezuela has now virtually ceased to exist; but there was a falling off in 1887, as compared with 1886, of £10,246 in value of imports to Trinidad (excluding bullion in transit)—namely, from £179,274 to £169,028; and in exports of £26,722—namely, from £168,585 to £141,863.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—BRITISH AND FOREIGN MINISTRIES OF COMMERCE.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have instituted any inquiry, or obtained any information from Foreign Governments, showing the difference of organization between the Board of Trade in this country and the Ministers of Commerce of Foreign Administrations; and, if not, whether they will do so?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham) (who replied) said: No such inquiry has been recently instituted; but if the hon. Member will furnish the Foreign Office with particulars of the information he desires to obtain, and the countries from which it should be procured, Reports will be called for.

NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION—REMOVAL OF THE VOLUNTEER CAMP FROM WIMBLEDON.

MR. NORTON (Kent, Tunbridge) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to the removal of the Volunteer Camp from Wimbledon, and in consideration of the great advantage to the country and the Volunteers generally if the annual meeting could continue to be held near London, and also the desirability of having a permanent range available for the Metropolitan Corps, Whether the Government will take steps to inquire as to the suitability of the Richmond Park site?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I understand that a deputation from the National Rifle Association waited upon my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works this morning on the subject to which my hon. Friend refers. It will be the duty of the Government carefully to consider the representation which was made to the First Commissioner, and they will to do so with as little delay as possible, having regard to the importance of the question. But I must point out to my hon. Friend, that if only the annual rifle meeting is sanctioned in Richmond Park, it will involve the exclusion of the public from a portion of the Park for a fortnight every year, and necessitate the removal of a large number of trees in the line of fire; while if the butts were to be available as a permanent range, the public would have to be permanently excluded from an area amounting to about one-half of the entire Park.

THE ADMIRALTY AND THE WAR OFFICE—HYPOTHETICAL INVASION OF THIS COUNTRY.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Royal Commission to be presided over by the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) will inquire into the relations between the Admiralty and War Office, as regards the conflicting statements made by the First Lord of the Admiralty and Adjutant General of the Army, respecting the transport required and available in French ports for the sudden invasion of this country by 100,000 men; whether the Commissioners will inquire into the relations between the Admiralty, the War Office, and the Treasury, with a view to ascertaining the grounds upon which the Treasury sanctions an annual expenditure by the War Office of over £14,000 a-year for military intelligence, besides over £4,000 a-year for military attachés, while the annual expenditure by the Admiralty for naval intelligence is under £5,000 a-year, and under £1,000 a-year for a naval attaché, as shown by Parliamentary Returns recently presented to the House?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): My hon. and gallant Friend is aware of the terms of the Reference to the Royal Commission on the Admiralty and War Office; and it is for the Commission, as a body, to determine what points they will or will not deal with. No Member of Her Majesty's Government can give any instructions to or interfere with the proceedings of a Royal Commission; and, under these circumstances, it is impossible for me to give my hon. and gallant Friend any definite information on the point which he has raised.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL — THE LICENSING CLAUSES — SUSPENSION OF NEW LICENCES.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the withdrawal of the Licensing Clauses of the Local Government Bill, the Government would be willing to introduce into that Bill a clause, or to bring in a short Bill to suspend for 12 months the issue of all new licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors, as was done in 1871, pending further consideration of the question?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In answer to my hon. Friend, I have to state that the Government are not prepared to enter into any arrangement or engagement with the House to introduce a Bill suspending for 12 months the issue of all new licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): Arising out of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to ask him whether, after the declaration made by the President of the Local Government Board in introducing the Local Government Bill, the House is to understand that the Government intend to postpone indefinitely dealing with the questions of Local Option, Sunday Closing, and the conferring of powers for granting licences upon Bodies to be elected by the ratepayers?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman must draw his own inference from the course which the Government have been compelled to take.

Subsequently,

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): With reference to the Notice given by the Government of their intention to omit certain clauses of the Local Government Bill, I beg leave to give Notice that when a Motion is made to omit Clause 9, relating to Sunday Closing, I shall oppose the omission of that clause.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL ESTIMATES.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Greenwich Hospital Estimates will be referred to the Select Committee on Navy Estimates?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Greenwich Hospital Estimates will not be within the terms of the Reference to the Select Committee on Navy Estimates.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

In reply to MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, that, in the present condition of Public Business, it was impossible for the Government to fix a date for taking the two Bills dealing with the subject of tithe rent-charge.

In reply to SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) and MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton),

MR. W. H. SMITH said, there would be a Morning Sitting to-morrow for the Local Government Bill. It might be necessary to take Supply one day next week—he hoped not more than one day—and the other days would be devoted to the Local Government Bill; but he would state definitely to-morrow if it would be necessary to take Supply, and, if so, on what day it would be taken.

GERMANY—HEALTH OF HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY FREDERICK III.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): In view of the alarming news about the German Emperor's health, I should like to ask the Government whether they have received any information of a more re-assuring character than is contained in to-day's newspapers?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I regret deeply that it is not in the power of the Government, nor in my power, to give the House any re-assuring information. We have not received any telegram from Berlin since the early morning, and all the information that has reached us is of the character to which my hon. Friend refers.

Subsequently,

MR. W. H. SMITH said: About an hour and a half ago I was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Salford a Question with reference to the condition of the German Emperor. At that time Her Majesty's Government had received no telegram from our Ambassador at Berlin; but we have since received a telegram, dated 3 o'clock to-day, from Berlin, informing us, I regret to say, that the Emperor's condition is much worse than it has been, and that there is now very little hope entertained of his recovery. Inflammation of the lungs has set in; but the Ambassador informs us that His Imperial Highness's intellect is perfectly clear, and that he is suffering no pain. It is with very great regret that I make this communication to the House; but it is, at least, some consolation to know that His Imperial Highness is free from pain, and that his intellect remains unclouded.

EXCISE DUTIES (LOCAL PURPOSES) BILL.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When he proposes to take the Wheel Tax Bill; or whether they were to understand the right hon. Gentleman meant to give it up?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I thought I had several times informed the House that that tax has not been given up. The time when it will be taken will depend on the progress of the Local Government Bill. It stands in the same category as other measures.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE COUNTY COUNCILS.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE)

(Tower Hamlets, St. George's) announced that he hoped a Paper would be in the Vote Office this evening giving the suggested numbers of the County Councils. This might be a convenience to hon. Members in view of the discussion on the subject.

In reply to Sir UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe),

MR. RITCHIE said, that he hoped the Amendments to the Bill would be laid on the Table to-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

NATIONAL DEBT (SUPPLEMENTAL) BILL.—[BILL 264.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Jackson.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, upon the third reading of this Bill, he will tell the House what he proposes to do with that portion of the Three per Cent Consols which still remains unconverted? At present, there is a considerable difference between the price of the old Consols which have not been converted and those which have been converted, so that the persons who did not take the advice to convert have got a good deal better treatment than the people who did convert. Therefore, there is a considerable portion of Stock, the amount of which I do not know, which is worth 20s. more than the converted Stock.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I cannot admit that because for a few weeks the converted Stock has fallen below par, therefore it is true that those who have not converted have got a better thing than those who have converted. The Three per Cent Stock is now in such a position that it can be paid off on 12 months' notice. Whether they will be in as satisfactory a position as those who have got a Stock on which 2½ per cent or 2½ per cent is guaranteed for a certain number of years is a question for the right hon. Gentleman and others to determine. If they are paid off at par in the course of a year, and should not be able to invest as well as they can at this particular moment, I should say that they will not be in so favourable a position as the holders of the New Stock. I think it is premature for the right hon. Gentleman opposite to attempt to mar the success of the operation.

MR. SPEAKER: I must call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that there is no Question before the House. No debate can arise at this stage, and the third reading will be taken to-morrow.

MR. GOSCHEN: I will answer the question of the right hon. Gentleman specifically and exactly on another occasion; but I may say now that out of a total of about £590,000,000 and more, the amount still outstanding is about £47,000,000.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Co. Mid.) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether, in connection with the Bill, Clause 1, which spoke of the market price of the Three per Cent Stock, referred to annuities or assets in the case of the National Debt Commissioners, in respect of trustee savings banks?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! There can be no discussion upon this stage of the Bill.

DR. TANNER intimated that he would put the question to-morrow.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE [REMUNERATION, &c.]

COMMITTEE.

MATTER—considered in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to authorize the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of remuneration to Railway Companies for receiving and forwarding traffic under the authority of a Secretary of State or the Admiralty, and of compensation to any person suffering loss for anything done under such authority, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session to make better provision respecting National Defence."—(Mr. Secretary Stanhope.)

MR. PICTON (Leicester) said, there had been no explanation of the necessity for this Resolution. There was nothing to justify such a Resolution, except some expectation of invasion that appeared to him to be a most improbable thing. Such a Resolution was calculated to excite a great deal of alarm. If such a monstrously improbable contingency were to arise, he supposed that any Government would seize the railways in case of necessity, and ask for a Bill of Indemnity afterwards. He presumed it would be impossible that there would be any invasion of this country without some amount of previous rumour or expectation. If such a difficulty were to arise, Bills could be passed through the two Houses within 24 hours, or even less, in case of necessity. He could not see that any good ground had been shown for the Resolution, and he hoped the Secretary of State would give some information to the House upon the subject.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): This is only a formal Resolution on which a Bill would be founded. When the clause comes on in Committee, the hon. Member will have an opportunity for raising the question. Although we certainly do not anticipate an invasion, we believe that the best way to prevent the possibility of such a thing is to be prepared. We are only asking for such powers as we deem reasonable and necessary, and which we might have to use in the case of emergency.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

CUSTOMS (WINE DUTY) BILL

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Jackson.)

[BILL 293.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): In moving the second reading of this Bill, I may, perhaps, be allowed to call the attention of the House to the circumstances which have rendered it necessary to introduce it. It will be in the recollection of the House that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), in introducing his Budget, asked the House to sanction a tax upon bottled wines to the extent of 5s. per dozen. The House on that occasion was good enough to grant my right hon.

Mr. Picton

Friend's demand; but in the course of the discussion, and on the Report stage of the Bill, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Craig) moved a Resolution and initiated a discussion, suggesting the exemption from the tax of all wines under 30s. a dozen. That proposal met, I may say, with a very large amount of acceptance in the House, and it met also with what I may venture to call a benevolent reception from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was pointed out most forcibly that the proposal to tax all bottled wines at the same rate of 5s. per dozen would fall very heavily on a very considerable portion of wine which was imported into this country in bottles of a very useful character, but which comes in at a very moderate price. It was quite recognized that if any plan could be found by which exemption, or partial relief, could be given to this class of wines, it was the duty of my right hon. Friend to consider it, and, if possible, to give effect to it. As the result of that discussion, my right hon. Friend promised to the House a plan by which some relief might be given to wines of that character. The difficulties were recognized by my right hon. Friend when he had to consider them previously to the introduction of his Budget to this House. It was pointed out at the time that there were at the disposal of the Government very few figures which enabled my right hon. Friend to form a very accurate estimate, either as to the quantity of bottled wines imported into this country, and still less of the quantity of the proportions of those bottled wines which would have to be exempt because they were less than 30s. a dozen. I believe that for some considerable time there have been no separate statistics kept at the Customs with reference to the importation of bottled wines. But the opportunity which had been offered has enabled some figures, which I believe may be taken to be reliable, to be obtained, showing not only the total import of bottled wines into this country, but also affording an approximate estimate as to the proportion of sparkling wines and still wines comprised in that total. I have said that there were no statistics, and perhaps it may be thought by some hon. Members that my right hon. Friend and the Department over which he presides are to blame because those statistics are not forthcoming. Let me point out to hon. Members what the obvious answer to that is. After the statement I have made that no separate statistics have been kept of the quantity of bottled wines imported into this country, it is obvious to every Member of this House that to have entered into an investigation, and to have called for statistics from all parts of the Kingdom, would have been most effectually to have informed the public beforehand what was in the mind of my right hon. Friend previously to the introduction of his Budget, and I think that I may say that there is not the smallest evidence to show that in the inquiries which have been made, necessarily limited as they were, the secret was not well kept by the Department, and it was absolutely unknown to the public that my right hon. Friend contemplated imposing a duty on bottled wine. The investigation which has taken place, and I may say that it took place both at home and abroad—has not only furnished us with what I believe to be reliable figures, but it has also, I may say, at the outset, considerably facilitated the task which my right hon. Friend had set before himself. The figures which have been obtained show that the original estimate was under the mark, and that my right hon. Friend had a considerable margin in which to work in his endeavour to find a method of giving exemption to those wines which are under 30s. a-dozen. I will give to the House a few figures which have been obtained as the result of the investigation. These figures, although an estimate only, have been checked in various ways, and are believed to be approximately accurate. It is estimated that the total import of bottled wines into this country is in round figures 2,500,000 gallons. Of those 2,500,000 gallons, about two-fifths or 1,000,000 gallons are represented by still wines, and about three-fifths, or 1,500,000 gallons may be taken to represent the quantity of sparkling wines. Of the still wines, of which the total is said to be about 1,000,000 gallons, it is believed that, at a liberal estimate, about one-fourth—or about 250,000 gallons—consists of wines worth more than 30s. per dozen, while the remaining three-fourths, or 750,000 gallons will, it is estimated, come in below the limit of 30s. per dozen. Then, Sir, with regard to the sparkling wines, at which the total import is estimated at 1,500,000 gallons, about two-thirds, or 1,000,000 gallons will, it is estimated, come in over the limit of 30s. a-dozen, while about one-third, or 500,000, will come in below the limit of 30s. I should like to point out to the House one very important fact that has come to our knowledge and been impressed upon us in the course of these investigations—that is, that the customs and the habits of the people of this country in the direction of drinking wine appears very largely to have changed, and changed not only in regard to the particular wines which they drink, but also with regard to the quantity of wine they drink. While the total quantity of wine—not bottled wine only—imported into this country and retained for home consumption is now only about the same as it was in the year 1866 the proportion of sparkling wines which is imported into this country has enormously increased. Therefore, the importation of sparkling to still wine imported in bottle bears to-day a much larger proportion to the total than it did in 1866, or in any subsequent year. This change which has been going on appears from the figures to be, at all events for the present, continuous, and so far as we are able to judge it is likely to continue. I will give the House the figures. While in 1866 the total white wine imported into this country was taken at 958,000 gallons, in 1887 it had risen to 1,538,000 gallons, or an increase of very nearly 60 per cent. This, as I have pointed out, was the case notwithstanding the fact that the total of wine imported into this country for home consumption was in 1866, 13,226,000 gallons, and in 1887, 13,694,000 gallons. These figures go to show that the quantity of sparkling wine imported into this country, and of course imported in bottle, has shown a very considerable tendency to increase to even a larger extent than my right hon. Friend had estimated. Now, Sir, on these figures my right hon. Friend had to ask himself how he could grant relief to the cheaper wines, and thus meet what he believed to be the wishes of the House, and I hope I may also add the claims of Bordeaux. My right hon. Friend had to consider, first, how to protect and preserve his estimated revenue; secondly, how to relieve the cheap wines; and, thirdly, how to do this without giving the least incentive to fraud and friction. Several plans were suggested and were open to him. The first which I will mention was one which naturally presented itself—namely, to exempt generally all wines from the tax which were under the value of 30s. a-dozen. But when this question came to be examined it was found, in the first place, that a general exemption of that kind would, as far as still wines were concerned, leave but a very small proportion of the whole upon which the tax could be calculated. I would remind the House that a general exemption of that kind, or even a special exemption, as applied to some wines would necessitate, of course, not only that an examination with endless forms of procedure should be gone through with regard to wines on which the duty was to be calculated, but also an examination of all the wines imported which were exempt. It would follow, therefore, and I think the House will agree with me, that for the purpose of raising the comparatively limited amount of revenue which would have been obtained from still wines, it was extremely undesirable to impose upon the traders any more irksome condition of dealing with it than was absolutely necessary in the interests of the Revenue. I will point out, further, that so far as still wine is concerned there is the greatest possible difficulty in fixing or making regulations by which, in a reasonably easy manner, the value of the wine can be readily determined and a tax levied. In the first place, in regard to still wine, it is not even enough to rely on the brand, even though that brand be Château Lafite, or Château Latour, or Château Margaux, because, I am told, that it happens that the vintage in certain years is not worth nearly so much as in others. These wines, which are known as high class vintage wines, have their bad seasons, and the wine of a particular vineyard might be inferior and not worth so much as wine grown outside of it in the same year. Perhaps I may be allowed to point out also in regard to these still wines that there is this important difficulty. There are, practically, none of these wines which cannot be imported in cask into this country, and, therefore, if you impose a duty of 2s. 6d. a gallon, or 5s. a dozen on all wines over 30s. a dozen in value, you will be offering a strong temptation, in the first place, to fraudulent declaration, and a strong temptation, in the second place, to import such wines into this country in casks and so evade the duty altogether. My right hon. Friend has come to the conclusion, taking all these circumstances into consideration, and also the important fact that he had a margin, to give an exemption to all still bottled wines. With regard to sparkling wine the case is very different. In the first place, a much larger portion of the whole comes to this country as wine of a value beyond 30s. a dozen, and, in the second place, it is believed that such wine cannot be imported into this country except as bottled wine. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has received many suggestions, even from high authorities, that if this duty is imposed as it is proposed, attempts will be made to evade the tax by sending sparkling wines into this country with false corks and replacing them when they come here with corks representing their real character. But I do not attach very much importance to that, and my right hon. Friend has arrived at what, I believe, to be a happy solution of the difficulty—namely, to put a tax of 2s. 6d. per gallon upon all sparkling wine over 30s. per dozen in value, and a tax of 1s. per gallon on all sparkling wine under 30s. per dozen in value. He is of opinion that that will fairly meet the difficulty, because, in the first place, it secures the Revenue, and, in the second place, removes all temptation to fraud, because the difference between 2s. per dozen and 5s. per dozen does not leave a sufficient reward or a sufficient incentive to induce anyone to undergo the enormous risk which would be involved in attempting to evade the Revenue and in incurring penalties by falsely declaring the value of wine. I may also remind the House that while we hear so much about temptation to commit fraud, no business firm of reputation could lend themselves to such fraudulent practices without placing themselves entirely at the mercy of their servants by whom the practices would have to be performed. The Bill now before the House makes two alterations in the existing conditions of things. It corrects what I cannot but feel was a mistake in the previous Bill—namely, that the duty was imposed upon the dozen bottles instead of the gallon of wine. That has been remedied in the present Bill. The other alteration is that it changes the method of imposing the duty, that it exempts altogether all still wine from the additional duty, and that it moderates and modifies the duty upon those cheap champagnes of which we have already heard something in this House. I hope that the proposals of my right hon. Friend will meet with the general acceptance of the House. I will only say, in conclusion, that I shall hope to have the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), because the right hon. Gentleman was good enough to say on the Report stage of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, and in reference to this particular question—

“If the right hon. Gentleman undertook that in the course of the present Session he would introduce some legislation which, under the authority of Parliament, would carry out the principle of relieving the lower class wines, that would be most satisfactory.”

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) was also good enough to say—

“If the Government would undertake to bring in a Bill as rapidly as they could after they had obtained information as to which particular wines, if imported in bottle, would pay the lower rate of duty, they ought to place confidence in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that that would be done, but the matter would not bear much longer delay. If his right hon. Friend gave an assurance that no time should be lost in formulating a Bill under which the cheaper wines should come in at a cheaper rate, he thought the House might be satisfied.”

The Government have endeavoured to carry out that undertaking. They have formulated this plan, which they submit to the House with confidence, and I beg now to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): The quotation which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury has read from my speech is not strictly accurate. What I did say was that I hoped the Bill would be formulated as soon as possible by my right hon. Friend, that it would be acceptable to the House, and that we would do what we could to build a bridge for him, considering the retreat which he has to make. The position in which we stand at this moment is that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other day gave the House at some length the new plan he proposed with respect to the Wine Duties, and when he had placed that new plan at great length before the House, I ventured to say that I thought so novel a proposal ought to be accompanied by some Paper-laid before Parliament. My right hon. Friend said that it was not a novel proposal, and he justified that statement by a reference to what was done by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) in 1880, and also by a reference to the first arrangement of the Wine Duties for some years after 1860. Now, those proposals, and particularly that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, had reference generally to bottled wines, and there was nothing novel, however it might be objectionable, in the first proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but the novelty of the present proposal in the first place is, that the additional duty is only to be imposed on sparkling wines, and the other and more important novelty is, that all sparkling wines are not to bear the same duty, but there are to be two duties—one with respect to the more valuable wine, and the other with respect to the wine which is of less value. Both of those proposals contain elements of absolute novelty in our recent legislation on this subject. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was only brought in and circulated this morning, and I regret that it has not been accompanied by some document which would have been of interest to all of us. Of course we have not had time to consider the statistical statement which has just been made by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. Let me state in a few words how it appears to me that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman should strike hon. Members. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a proposal in the Budget of a perfectly plain and simple character—namely, to add 5s. a-dozen, or about 2s. 6d. a gallon, to the duty on all wines coming into this country in bottle. Let me remind the House of the reason for taking that course, which the right hon. Gentleman gave at the time the proposal was made. He said—

“It is very possible that an extra tax imposed upon these high-classed wines may lead to some remonstrances from Foreign Powers; but I am bound to say that remonstrances of ours to Foreign Powers with regard to impositions of duties on British goods have not been so entirely successful as to make it necessary for us, more than is absolutely compatible with our own interests, to look beyond the fiscal merits of the question.”—(3 Hansard, [324] 313.)

That was the first excuse of the right hon. Gentleman, and it was not unnaturally cheered by Fair Traders and others who looked upon retaliation as not an unwise act. Without in the smallest degree approving of retaliation, I am not at all surprised that that feeling was exhibited. Then my right hon. Friend went on to say, further—

“I propose a tax of 5s. per dozen on bottled wines, which is equivalent to 2s. 6d. a gallon. . . . I estimate this tax to bring in an additional revenue of £125,000. I take note, in making this estimate, of the probable—nay, certain—diminution of the amount of wine which may at present be imported in bottles, and which will in future be imported in casks. It is possible that the bottling trade in England may receive a certain impetus, but I cannot conceive that that is an objection to the plan. . . . I trust hon. Members will not grudge the imposition of this tax; but I admit that the greater portion of this additional tax will have to be borne by sparkling wines.”—(Ibid. 313-14.)

MR. CHILDERS: I am stating the right hon. Gentleman's answers to the objections which he anticipated would be made, and to objections which had already come. He made a statement on bringing forward his proposal, and in anticipation he met the objections to it. I would point out to my right hon. Friend that his present proposal will not give one iota of encouragement to the bottling trade. All that has gone entirely. No additional duty is to be imposed on still wines, however valuable, and of course sparkling wines always come to this country in bottle; so that the bottling trade, to whose support he appealed, will gain by the present proposal. Then, at any rate, the advantages which were so much cheered in a particular quarter of the House have disappeared altogether. Then, in respect of foreigners, let me point out how different is the tone of my right hon. Friend now from the language he used before. Although he anticipated that objections would come from Foreign Powers, and particularly from France, he made very light of those objections. But now everyone knows that this fresh proposal has been made in consequence of the objections of the French Government. The French Government are now satisfied with the arrangement made by my right hon. Friend; and, therefore, all that he said about our being entitled to disregard the remonstrances of Foreign Powers because they disregard ours was mere tall talk. The arrangement has been made, as everybody knows, after the most careful communications with Foreign Powers, and especially with the French Government, and it is no secret that the French Government are perfectly satisfied.

MR. GOSCHEN: That is the first intimation that I have received that the French Government is perfectly satisfied.

MR. CHILDERS: I think I can inform him that if he is not aware of it, it is apparent to 99 out of every 100 persons who are interested in the matter, and is perfectly notorious in France. What I wish to point out, however, is that all the boast of disregarding the protestations of Foreign Powers has now gone, and so has everything in reference to the encouragement of the bottling trade. The House will fully understand that we have now to deal with my right hon. Friend's proposal on the basis of what the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury has stated to-night, and we have to cast aside the Budget speech and come to the simple fact whether it is desirable or not to pick out a certain class of wine—namely, sparkling wine, and to say that because that wine contains a certain amount of carbonic acid gas it should be taxed at a higher price than other wines which do not contain that amount of gas. It is also to be taxed at a higher rate if it is above a certain value, and at a lower rate if it is below that value. I do not think the House will be very well satisfied with the further explanation of the hon.

Mr. Childers

Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. Let the House remember this—we abolished, not off-hand, but after careful consideration, the whole of our system of ad valorem duties. The results of a century's experience of the evil working of ad valorem duties are now to be forgotten, and the system is to be applied to an article probably the worst fitted for the change. But in one point the former system is altered for the worse. When ad valorem duties were in force, the value was set by the importer; but to protect the revenue, the Customs had the power of purchasing the goods at an addition of 10 per cent to that value. This is the rule adopted by all foreign countries which still levy ad valorem duties. But if we claim to purchase without any addition to value declared, will not they retaliate? I do not know whether that point has occurred to my right hon. Friend, but, to my mind, it is one worthy of consideration. What will be the result of the plan now put before the House? The plan of the Budget, though, in my opinion, grievously objectionable, and glad as I am that my right hon. Friend has given it up, had, at any rate, one advantage, that it had the support of the trade, and also that it added simply so much to the duty on all wine in bottle. The change now proposed by my right hon. Friend, instead of having the support of the trade, has its strong opposition; the trade has expressed its opinion that the plan is practically unworkable. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury doubts whether it is unworkable, but he will not deny that the trade has expressed that opinion. If carried into effect, we shall have three classes of duty on wine—namely, a duty varying with alcoholic strength on all wine not in bottle, a higher rate on all wine imported in bottle below a certain value, and a third rate on all wine imported above a certain value. Further, if my right hon. Friend's original proposal, as contained in the Budget, had been carried out, he would, no doubt, have received a large amount of revenue. But is it worth while to disturb our Customs system for the sake of so small a sum as this will produce, and to bring back for such a trifle the ad valorem duty principle? Besides, if you introduce this principle as affecting wine, will you not be asked to treat spirits similarly? Brandy imported from North Germany is worth only a few pence a-gallon, whereas brandy imported from the Charente is worth as many shillings. I know the answer to that will be that that is a much more difficult matter, because we have home-made spirits to deal with also, and it would be necessary to disturb the Excise as well as the Customs' system. I presume that the same thing can be said in regard to beer; but there are two in our list of dutiable articles to which the answer would not apply—namely, tea and tobacco. If for the purpose of raising a small amount of revenue you are to introduce the ad valorem principle with regard to wines, you will certainly be asked to introduce the same principle in the case of tea. The higher class teas are worth several shillings per pound more than the inferior qualities, which may not be worth more than 6d. a pound, and if you disturb the rule which has been hitherto adopted for such a small matter as this, you may have ad valorem duties in regard to tea, by which the higher class tea would be taxed at double and treble the rate paid by the lower class tea, instead of the present uniform duty. Again, with respect to tobacco, experiments have been tried recently in reference to growing tobacco in this country. There is no doubt now, after those experiments, that tobacco cannot be grown in this country with commercial advantage if it pays the regular rate of duty. Then, what may follow? The result of my right hon. Friend's proposal may be that you will be asked to tax tobacco ad valorem. The inferior kinds of foreign tobacco are, I am aware, for the most part now imported into Germany, whereas the more expensive kinds come to this country and France; but, for the sake of encouraging the inferior home produce, you may have the strongest pressure to do what would ruin the revenue—namely, to impose two or three different duties on tobacco, varying with its value, to the utter destruction of the present trade. For these reasons, I warn my right hon. Friend that his proposal for the purpose of raising so small an amount of additional revenue is not worth the disturbance it will create. I hope that he will even now see the necessity of withdrawing it.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven) said, he wished to state the objections which he entertained to the Bill, and which were also urged not only by the trade associations which the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had mentioned, but also generally throughout the country. It was a great misfortune that the right hon. Gentleman should have departed from his original proposals which had been accepted by the trade universally, and, as far as he knew, by the country generally. There might have been a question whether or not the duty should be levied so high as 5s., but he believed that everybody throughout the country would have been glad to accept the principle. But, of course, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to deal with the opposition of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite, who would, no doubt, have objected to any proposal made by the Government. Their great object was to get his right hon. Friend out of Office and secure it for themselves. That was a very natural feeling; but after having read very carefully the debate which took place on the subject, and having studied the official records of that debate, he (Mr. Bentinck) had come to the conclusion that there had been only two tangible objections made to the original proposals. The first was the fear of offending France and other foreign countries, and the other was lest injustice should be done to the consumers of the cheaper and lighter wines. Now, nobody had greater respect for France than he had, and he had no desire to say anything in disparagement of its Government. He was one of those who had always endeavoured to maintain the entente cordiale, and to promote a good understanding with France. At the same time, he did not agree with the hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), who appeared to be always wanting to run away from France. He had seen a good deal of that sort of thing in his time, and, no doubt, the hon. Member had also; but we ought always to stick up for our rights, and he believed that if we took that attitude in this matter, there would not have been any disturbance in our commercial relations with the French, which had much more to lose than we had, and would and the retaliation policy disadvantageous in the long run. If the French took offence, they would have to give way in the end, and the views of his right hon. Friend would have prevailed. He believed that the wine introduced from Germany was comparatively small, but might there have been some complaint from that country. He very much regretted that his right hon. Friend had not stuck to his guns. He now came to the other objection, which was raised by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Craig), and that was, whether any injustice or injury would be done to the consumers of cheap wines. He maintained that no injury or injustice would be done. He thought it was a most unfortunate thing that his right hon. Friend had given up his proposal to tax still wines, especially when they were told that one-fourth of the still wines now imported were worth more than 30s. a-dozen and three-fourths were under 30s. a-dozen. If that were so, there was a stronger reason for adhering to the original proposal. If the figures of the Secretary to the Treasury were absolutely correct, on his own showing, of the still wine introduced into this country 1,000,000 gallons, or three-fourths, were under 30s. per dozen in value, and therefore, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had kept to the original proposal, three-fourths of that wine would have escaped duty. He thought the Government had committed a great mistake in the matter, without giving any advantage whatever to the consumers of light wine. He was informed by those who were acquainted with the subject that there was no reason whatever why still light wines should not be imported in cask, and that it was very much better that they should be. The importation of still wines in bottle was nothing more than a premium upon adulteration. Many cheap wines which were imported in bottle were the result of mixture; whereas it was more difficult to deal in that manner with the wine imported in cask.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): No; they came principally in cask.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he was informed that there was at Cette, in France, a large manufacturer of cheap still wine for importation to this country which consisted of a mixture of three descriptions—a wine grown in France, mixed with a Spanish port, and a coarse wine imported from Naples. These were all mixed together, and came to this country under the name of—well, perhaps, it would be hardly fair to state the name, but the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian would be familiar with it. It was difficult to adopt that course in regard to wine imported in cask. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stuck to his original proposal, there would have been an advantage to the consumer as well as to the Treasury. With regard to the proposal as to sparkling wine, he entirely agreed with what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). The present proposal was for an ad valorem duty. It made it 2s. 6d. per gallon in one case, and 1s. in the other, according to the value. He believed that to be an unsound principle, and he was very sorry that it should have emanated from the Treasury Bench. He could not imagine for the life of him how the Custom House officers were to discriminate between the value of wines. He was old enough, he was sorry to say, to remember the time when works of art coming into this country from the Continent were subject to an ad valorem duty, and in that case, if there was any difficulty, the owner declared the value, the Custom House officers charged 10 per cent upon it, and there was an end of the matter. How that was to be done in the case of wine he could not imagine. The right hon. Gentleman had adopted a very unfortunate principle, and one which he could not support. He should not pretend to divide the House against the second reading of the Bill; but he should feel it his duty to bring forward some Amendments in Committee, and he hoped, therefore, that his right hon. Friend and the Secretary to the Treasury would give ample time for that purpose. He could assure his right hon. Friend that the matter was being gravely considered by the whole trade throughout the country. It was no light question, or one that ought to be decided in a violent hurry; but while he entertained objections to the Bill, he hoped his right hon. Friend would not give way to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South

Edinburgh, that he should withdraw his proposals altogether, because he thought it was possible to amend the Bill in Committee, and it was better that only sparkling wines should be taxed than that there should be no taxation at all. He thought there might be some advantage to the bottled trade, and he did not hesitate to say that the principle established was not at all inconsistent with the principles of Free Trade to put small taxes upon manufactured articles for purposes of revenue. He wished that the proposals of his right hon. Friend had remained as they originally stood; because he believed they would be acceptable to the country at large. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would tell the House when he proposed to take the Bill in Committee.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: What the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down complains of is this—that, as the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer first appeared before us, it undoubtedly contained a protective element, and that protective element has now disappeared. Hence arises the hostility of the right hon. Gentleman to the proposal. The right hon. Gentleman thought that he had obtained from a distinguished supporter of Free Trade a concession which was a sort of incipient conversion, and that right hon. Gentleman was acting contrary to the principles of which he had always been a distinguished advocate. His hopes had been disappointed, and consequently he now opposes the plans of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I need not say that that is not an inducement to those who sit on this side of the House to vote with the right hon. Gentleman. But the right hon. Gentleman appears to me, with a singular absence of tact, to do everything in his power to prevent us from voting with him; because he has taken occasion to introduce into his speech the unnecessary expression of his conviction that on this side of the House we never open our mouths to criticize any proposal of the Government, either great or small, except for the purpose of putting the Government out of Office. The right hon. Gentleman has thought it necessary to lash us with the indignation which he has used on many previous occasions, even on this somewhat insignificant occasion. I wish now to say a word upon the proposal of the Government as it now stands before the House, as I feel it my duty to take part in the discussion and to express a very decided opinion on the plan as originally submitted. I cannot quite share the superlative exuberance of the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson). Does he really suppose that there has been some wonderful new device formulated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer by which he has extricated himself from a serious and awkward dilemma? The new invention is simply in itself a retractive measure—a falling back on the measure of ad valorem duties, which, after much experience, was abandoned as the principle of our trade legislation. I cannot, therefore, go the length of the Secretary to the Treasury, or say that I am pleased with the proposal of which my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh has pointed out the inconvenience and danger. I should be glad indeed if the speech of my right hon. Friend could persuade the Chancellor of the Exchequer to recede from the plan altogether, which I believe to be by far the best way of dealing with the subject. It is only fair, however, to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that, as between two evils, he has chosen the lesser. For my own part, I regard the mischief contained in the proposal as of an entirely different order, and of a very much milder character than the danger and mischief which seemed to attend the original plan. What we had then in view was the serious apprehension of the disturbance of our trade relations with one of the most important countries of the Continent, and, possibly, by example and by contagion, with other countries on the Continent also. I am very glad indeed to be able to congratulate my right hon. Friend sincerely on the fact that he has so modified his plan that we may, I think, dismiss all apprehension of this kind from our minds. The danger which was to be feared from the first proposals arose in part from the augmentation of the duty which was imposed, and partly from the protective element involved. The original plan appeared to bring those very serious dangers into view. The danger which we have now to consider amounts to this—that the proposal may lead, or, at least, it is conceivable that it may lead, to undervaluing and fraud, and to the disturbance and confusion of trade which is connected with fraud, and indirectly in that way to the loss of revenue sooner or later. The Secretary to the Treasury has told us that of the sparkling wines, two-thirds are above the value of 30s. and one-third below that value. I take it for granted that an inquiry has been carefully made, and we may take those figures to be absolutely correct. But I think it will not be at all hazardous to predict that in future years, the proportion of wine entered below that value will increase; while the proportion of that above will have a tendency to diminish. But what I should like to say, however, is that having had very great and serious injuries in view on a former occasion, I now find those evils reduced and brought within a manageable compass. I do not know whether the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman will last long or not; but, at any rate, if inconvenience is found to arise, it will be within our own discretion to remove it, as the proceeds he expects to realize are not of a very important character. We shall not be creating disturbances in our relations with trade in a foreign country, which, when once created, it would have been impossible for us to escape from, because it would not have depended upon our free will and independent agency to abandon the proposal—but once the mischief had been done, the mere abandonment under such circumstances may have been totally ineffectual. Well, what the House has now before it is an experiment of some hazard. I am sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer knows all about the history of the wine trade, and how the difficulty of the ad valorem duty was always regarded as an insurmountable difficulty. I am inclined to agree with my right hon. Friend that the difficulty would not be so great in the case of sparkling wines as if the duty were applied to wine in general. Still, I cannot dismiss the apprehension that the ingenuity of trade would not be satisfied by this imposition upon wines of a higher value than 30s. a dozen if there was nothing of a magical or even of a determinate character in the kind of value so fixed. It may be, and I think it is far from improbable, that it will be found that a door will be opened to fraud under the modified scheme; but I am glad to think that if that be so, the necessity of retracing our steps, although perhaps inconvenient, will not be a national misfortune. In my opinion, at an earlier stage of the matter, we were really within danger of a national misfortune, and that danger has only been removed in consequence of the judicial changes made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the direction in which he has moved. Should Parliament find that objectionable practices are resorted to, it will be in its power to apply a remedy. I, therefore, offer a relative congratulation to the Government upon the plan they have proposed, and, undoubtedly, a portion of my own anxiety having been removed, I am not disposed to offer any opposition to the plan of the right hon. Gentleman as it now stands, and I venture to hope that it may be found to work well.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, he was sorry that he was unable to find himself in accord with his right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) with respect to the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer removing the objections which were raised to the scheme in its original form. Now, it would do so partly, but it would still remain a considerable drawback and disadvantage, and he should be glad indeed if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, even at the eleventh hour, be induced to withdraw the Bill. He had hoped that the right hon. Member for South Edinburgh would have proceeded with a little more vigorous decision, and would have moved the rejection of the Bill at this stage. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been at his wit's end how to raise the money on a great emergency, he could not have fallen into a worse plan than the form in which the Bill was originally presented to Parliament. What was it that the right hon. Gentleman was seeking to accomplish. He was trying to scrape together from most objectionable sources a sum of money that would enable him to make up a surplus whereby he would be able to reduce the Income Tax by 1d. in the pound. He (Mr. Illingworth) could not imagine that the right hon. Gentleman seriously meant to retain the proposition that was contained in the original scheme, and he should like to ask the right hon.

Gentleman whether its inception had anything to do with the construction of a weapon which might be used against France in reference to the Sugar Duties? [Mr. Goschen said, the Government had no such desire.] He was glad to find that there had been no such desire on the part of the Government. He was, nevertheless, at a loss to conceive why the right hon. Gentleman should have imposed a tax of this character. It was said that this was an ad valorem tax, but it did not even stand on that footing pure and simple; because if it had been a tax on wines above a certain value, it would have applied to still wines as well as to sparkling wines, whereas it was a tax which was to be levied only on a certain class of wine. Hitherto, the tax had been levied on foreign wines according to their alcoholic strength, but a new principle was now about to be introduced. In reality, this tax would be known in the future as the bubble tax. The right hon. Gentleman had discovered where the bubble lay in the wine, and had made it a basis of increased taxation. It was said on that side of the House that the French Government were satisfied; but, curiously enough, the Government did not seem to be aware of the fact that the alteration of their scheme had given satisfaction to the French Government. He confessed that some of the objections to the original scheme had been removed; but it was impossible to say that the French Government or the French people could be entirely satisfied with a proposal which imposed increased taxation upon French wines, and not on the wines of Germany or any other Government. He thought the French people had a right to complain, and the fact that the imposition of the tax might produce a coolness in our international relations was a question which could not be lightly passed over. He still entertained a hope that the Government would find an easy way of withdrawing their proposal, seeing the objections that were taken to it, and having regard to the fact that it was in the teeth of all the previous convictions of the right hon. Gentleman. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would listen to the appeal which had been made to him from that side of the House, and the opinion which had been expressed by Gentlemen on the other side that it was not a satisfactory measure. In that case, he might find a method of escaping the difficulties and inconveniences which might possibly arise from standing by the measure. Nothing could be more injurious to this country, standing as it did at the head of the commercial world, than to set an example that would operate injuriously upon the trade of any country. We had adopted Free Trade principles, and he appealed to the House either to stand by them, or in a straightforward manner to abandon them. The present scheme did neither one nor the other, and it gave no satisfaction to anybody. It invited a spirit of retaliation from other countries, and the right hon. Gentleman in levying the tax did not attempt to give any counterbalancing advantage to France. The right hon. Gentleman had given no explanation, or entered into any details, as to the objections which had been raised by France, but it was satisfactory to find that a better feeling had now been established, and that the most obnoxious part of the proposal had been removed.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, that the Bill was a concession by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as far as it went, to objections raised from that side of the House and initiated by himself on the earliest mention of these wine duties. Without entering upon the question of sparkling wines, of which he would say nothing whatever, he felt bound to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for having made this concession as to still wines, more especially as, from communications which had reached him, he had reason to believe that the right hon. Gentleman had been subjected to pressure from the trade not to make it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, that quite apart from the main question of these duties he wished to express his satisfaction that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been able to make the change proposed in the Bill, which was to introduce an experiment in the direction of an ad valorem duty. He rejoiced at what had been done, not only on account of the wine trade of the country, but also on account of the wider reasons mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. He had always thought it was right to differentiate between the wine of the rich and the wine of the poor. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer carried out this experiment with regard to wine, in which he sincerely hoped he would succeed, and in that event the principle of ad valorem duty, which had on account of practical difficulties only not been applied before, might be resorted to with regard to other articles also. He approved the system under which the officers of the Revenue might take wine at its declared value, which system had been in use in India in his time and was found to be a most useful check.

MR. GOSCHEN : I have to thank the various speakers who have addressed the House for the conciliatory tone which they have adopted towards this proposal. My right hon. Friend the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), although he objects entirely to the changes made, was still very conciliatory in his language, and I would especially thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) for what he called his relative congratulation on my proposal. My right hon. Friend objects on the whole to taxes on bottled wine, but less to the present proposal than that which was previously made. There are three points which have been discussed with reference to this matter of duty; one bearing on the wine imported from France, another the introduction of the ad valorem principle, and the third the exemption of cheap wine from duty altogether. The main objection urged in letters received from the wine trade is that the modified proposal is too favourable to cheap wine. It appears for the most part that the trade do not like cheap wines at all. But I understand that there is a feeling in the House that cheap wine should be admitted on as favourable terms as possible. It has been stated to me by wine merchants that they liked the previous tax of 5s. on cheap wines because it discouraged the importation of a great deal of nasty stuff which ought not to be sold. I am bound to say that this has not made a strong impression on my mind, because I believe, however much we may wish to reach what is legitimately called a luxury, there is no disposition in the House to tax unduly what are called cheap wines. My original proposal would have had the effect of taxing the cheaper bottled wines, but I am glad to say that I now feel able to exempt all still bottled wines and to reduce the duty on Saumur. It is perfectly true, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) suggested, that by this method some high-class still French wines will escape, but if the duty had been left upon them the result would have been so small, as explained by my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, that it would not have been worth while to touch all still wines for the sake of the small duty that would have been derived from the high-class portion of them. We have calculated that no more than one-tenth of the still wine now coming to this country in bottle would henceforth have paid duty, if everything under 30s. a-dozen were let off. Therefore, nine-tenths of the still wines would have been subjected to all the difficulty of proving their claim to exemption in order to tax the other one-tenth. For this reason we propose now to tax only sparkling wines, two-thirds of which are above 30s. value, and one-third only below that value. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian says that these proportions will diminish as time goes on, and that more wine will come in of less than 30s. a-dozen value. But it seems to me, as my right hon. Friend has stated, that it will be easier to detect the value of sparkling wine than that of still wines. It is infinitely easier to detect the value of sparkling wine, because the whole of the trade is in much fewer hands than in the case of Bordeaux. The great champagne houses have reputations to lose, and you can follow their wines with much greater ease than you can the ordinary red wines. In the case of champagne, the corks in most cases bear the brand of the firm and the year of the vintage, and it would not be worth while for the sake of 2s. a dozen to dispense with those marks which stamp the wines in the London market and secure for them the prices which they obtain. Now, with regard to the ad valorem principle, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh has asked whether for the small amount of revenue derived from this duty it is worth while to introduce such a novel principle. But, Sir, I do not admit that £125,000, the amount to be derived from sparkling wine, an article of luxury, is an item to be disregarded. My right hon. Friend suggests that it is dangerous to introduce this principle, and that pressure might be used to extend it to other articles. I am not at one with my right hon. Friend, and I do not object to the ad valorem principle, so far as its equity is concerned; I object to it, when I object at all, on account of the difficulty of working it out. But even if you found it could be easily worked out in this case, it would be no argument in favour of its application in the case of tea and tobacco for instance. If you could discriminate between the tobacco smoked by the poor man and the fine cigar of the rich man, I should be only too glad to introduce such a change in our revenue, and the same with regard to tea; but there are no marks indicative of value in these cases which are very easily discoverable, as there are in the case of sparkling wines. There is one point remaining to which I have to ask the attention of the House, and that is the question of the attitude of France. What I stated on this subject to my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh was perfectly true. We have had no negotiations with the French Government on the subject; they have acknowledged from the first that we have entire fiscal liberty. I have had one or two conversations with my friend M. Waddington; I am more or less acquainted with what is going on in France. But our conversations were entirely unofficial, and what M. Waddington has said had been that he had no instructions to express approval or disapproval of any particular modification, though he might express his own individual opinion about it. The English Government have claimed, and will continue to claim, entire freedom in this matter, and that claim has never been disputed. After the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian I do not want to say anything controversial; but, at the same time, I must point out that our position with regard to the original tax was rendered more difficult by the debate which took place, in which the French people were informed on the authority of a right hon. Gentleman of great position that there was a protective character in the Bill. We asserted from the beginning that there was no Protection whatever in our proposal, but I admit it was far more likely to be quoted as a precedent for Protection in France after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) appears to regard with unction the prospect of international difficulties on this question, but the House will be glad to know that there is not the least reason to believe that the tax on sparkling wine will interfere in the slightest degree with the friendly commercial relations with France which Members on both sides of the House desired to see maintained. I have now only to thank the House for the way in which they have generally accepted this proposal, and I think that it would be generally for the interest of the trade that the Bill should now be pushed forward with all possible speed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, he did not wish to prolong the debate for a single moment, and would not have intervened but for the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought it necessary to complain of the conduct of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Benches. If they had not pointed out the danger and mischief of the right hon. Gentleman's original proposal, he would have gone on with proposals which he now himself admitted were founded on an entirely erroneous estimate; he would have discovered that the tax would have been double the amount which he had placed in his Budget. In the Budget the right hon. Gentleman assumed that the tax would produce £100,000, but he now found, on reference to the Customs, what he did not know before—namely, that the tax as originally proposed would produce £300,000. Therefore, their objection had enabled the right hon. Gentleman to ascertain the true facts with regard to the trade, and which led him to review his scheme. It was true that they regarded this plan of the right hon. Gentleman's as less objectionable than the one which he first brought forward, and they were extremely glad that the course which they had taken had brought about an amendment of that scheme, but as the right hon. Gentleman had stated he must not assume that hon. Members on that side approved the imposition of this tax even as altered. The right hon. Gentleman was not going to interfere with the trade in bottled still wine. Of course, it was always inconvenient to have to put an increased duty on wine; but he could not now see any justification or reason for interfering with sparkling wine by imposing this additional duty. He believed the amount expected to be raised was so small compared with the inconvenience, that it was not worth while to impose the duty at all. Whether the ad valorem system was good or not remained to be seen. He had been informed that the ingenuity of the trade had already begun to discount this question of high and low priced wines, and that a plan had also been started to average them and bring them under the 30s. value. If that were so, it was plain that they would in vain endeavour to impose this ad valorem duty. In any case it would, for a very small advantage, cause a great disturbance in the trade, and he regretted the right hon. Gentleman had ever brought forward this proposal. He did not accuse the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer of any protectionist proclivities, although an unfortunate phrase, which he did not believe was intended, had been seized upon by persons addicted to those doctrines.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.—[BILL 182.]

(Mr. Ritchie, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Long.)

COMMITTEE. [FIFTH NIGHT.]

[Progress 12th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

COUNTY COUNCILS.

Clause 2 (Composition and election of Council and position of chairman).

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 5, after paragraph (d), to insert—“(d.) Every councillor shall be entitled to claim a sum in payment of the expenses, if any, actually and reasonably incurred by him in travelling to and from the place of meeting of the council.”—(Mr. Arthur Acland.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Mr. Goschen

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, he need hardly state that there was every sympathy on the part of the Government with the desire given expression to by the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the Rotherham Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland). The Government desired that every facility possible should be given to those who desired to become members of the County Council. But the proposal of the hon. Gentleman was one which was more far-reaching than even he (Mr. Ritchie) anticipated. The Government thought that the facility which he desired should be afforded to certain people to attend the County Council ought to be made as it was made under other circumstances, privately rather than from the rates. So far as he knew, there was no precedent whatever for a proposal such as that which the hon. Gentleman made, and they felt that if it were assented to at all, it ought not to be dealt with under an Amendment in connection with this Bill, but by means of some general measure. Even if Her Majesty's Government could agree to the principle, it would certainly be most undesirable to accept the principle of the hon. Gentleman's Amendment in the Bill now before the House. It was impossible, if such a proposal were accepted, that it would stop at the County Council; it would be demanded that the same principle should be carried out in all local matters, in the case, for instance, of Poor Law Guardians. They knew quite well that persons had often to travel as much as 10 or 15 miles in order to reach the place of meeting, and that, with very few exceptions, the workhouse was as accessible as the town in which the County Council was likely to meet, and, therefore, sometimes expenses would be incurred by members of the Board of Guardians in reaching the scene of their labours. Again, the meetings of a Board of Guardians were very much more frequent than those of the County Council would be. Then there were the Highways Boards and the Burial Boards. The members of those Bodies were often put to no inconsiderable expense in fulfilling the duties of their office, and there was no means of providing the expenses necessary for the fulfilment of their duties when they were carried out within the area of their election. But not only, in his opinion, if this principle were accepted, would it have naturally to be applied to most other local institutions, but it would also form a very strong argument in favour of its application to Members of Parliament. ["Hear, hear!"] That cheer which met his observation only showed its great importance; it was clear that hon. Gentlemen who supported this proposal were prepared to carry it out very much further, and the argument he used was, therefore, very much increased in force. Clearly this was only the thin end of the wedge by which the burdens ultimately to be borne by the ratepayers and the taxpayers would be increased. If there was one thing which many hon. Members feared with reference to these County Councils, and the proposal to extend municipal institutions throughout the country, it was the extravagance and expense which might possibly result. That he believed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) the other day admitted when he said that in all probability the new plan of the Government would be attended with more expense. But if this principle was to be accepted, he thought the legitimate fears of hon. Gentlemen would be greatly intensified, and that a prejudice would be created against these County Councils which ought not to be set up. Therefore it was not only the question of payment of expenses of members going to the County Councils, but also of expense connected with all local institutions. Again, it was unfortunately perfectly clear that the difficulty of working men coming to the House of Commons was greater than it was likely to be in the case of members going to County Councils. It might be said that the original proposal was a very moderate one, and that only those who were willing to accept payment of their expenses should receive such payment. But it was impossible, if the principle of this Amendment were acknowledged, to say that a member should go in forma pauperis to claim payment of his expenses. Therefore the legitimate outcome was that every member should be entitled to be paid his expenses. [An hon. MEMBER: Why not?] He did not himself believe that the ratepayers of the country were prepared to do that, and he believed, further, that if ratepayers were to think that these institutions were to be made the means of inflicting increased burdens on the rates, they would lose their interest in this measure. Believing, as he did, that this appeal was to be met, not out of the purse of the ratepayers, but by other arrangement which could easily be made, the Government were not prepared to accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Rotherham.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he could understand the right hon. Gentleman objecting that the Amendment proposed was bad in principle. But, on the contrary, he understood him to say that it was right in principle. [MR. RITCHIE: No, no!] He was going to say what he understood, and to explain why he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that it was right in principle that working men elected to the position of Councillors or as Members of the House should be indemnified for expenses, or even remunerated for the services which they rendered. To use the right hon. Gentleman's own words, however, it was proposed that the expense should be met by private arrangement. The right hon. Gentleman did not say that the principle was wrong; he only objected to the thing being known and done openly.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE): I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I expressed the fullest sympathy with those who desire to see facilities given to gentlemen to attend the County Councils, but I did not recognize that the principle of payment out of the rates was right.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he understood that the right hon. Gentleman recognized the principle of payment if it were done privately. If he did not mean what he said, it was unfortunate, that he had said it. But what other private arrangement could be made which did not involve private payment? He could understand the right hon. Gentleman objecting to any kind of payment, whether or not thrown upon the rates, but words ought to have some meaning, and the words of the right hon. Gentleman were that the expense should be met privately rather than out of the rates. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) said, that any payment made should be made publicly. Private payments were unfortunate payments; payments made by societies of men to those who represented them in the House of Commons or on the County Council were retainers to the people who were paid, whereas he maintained that those who sat in that House should represent the interest of the whole of those by whom he was elected and not the interest of the men who made private payment for the purposes suggested. He said that the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman was an immoral suggestion. It might be said that his (Mr. Bradlaugh's) suggestion was immoral; but, then, he was not ashamed of his views, although he found often that the right hon. Gentleman was ashamed of his when they were put to him in clear language. There might be a local objection to the payment of members, but the effect of non-payment would be to exclude from the County Councils, as it had excluded in a great measure from that House, a number of men who might be of great service to it. He had always thought that Members of Parliament, or of any Public Body, ought to be paid for the services rendered to the public who elected them. He did not believe that many Members worked for nothing. He thought they all worked for some object; with some it might be personal ambition, more or less praiseworthy, or it might be the desire to have a place in the Government, which he thought a laudable aim for any man to seek in politics. But he put it, that to exclude from these Councils, which they were trying to make representative, men who could not, on account of the expense, reach the place where the Council was to be held was wrong. And, moreover, it was not correct to compare these County Councils with Boards of Guardians, school boards, and other institutions meeting close to the homes of the members. The very essence of this matter was that men must come from a long distance to the centre where the County Council met, and if they excluded all kinds of indemnity for the expenses of the persons elected, they limited the candidates to one class of men only—namely, that which could bear the expense of attendance. He did not shrink from accepting the consequences of this Amendment. He admitted that this was the assertion of the principle that men who were ready to give their services to the State in various forms should be indemnified not in a fashion which laid them open to a sneer. The proposal was a rough and ready way of meeting a difficulty which at present prevented poor men from sitting on the Councils. There was no dishonour in private payment, but it was an objectionable mode of proceeding; and, as he had said, payment should be made openly. The right hon. Gentleman said it was undesirable to raise the principle of the Amendment now. Why? It must be raised at some time, and it was undesirable now only because the right hon. Gentleman would have to face the discussion on this Bill instead of leaving it to be faced on some other. That was the only objection. The right hon. Gentleman thought that private payment was moral, but he (Mr. Bradlaugh) thought it immoral, and it was for that reason he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rotherham, and should not shrink from the consequence of doing so.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham) said, he was glad that the Government was going to resist this most dangerous proposal. No one who was conversant with public business could doubt that, whatever might be the mode of administration by County Councils, there would be very great increase of expense. It was admitted that the present system had worked well on all hands, and a Minister of the Crown had stated that it had been most admirable and most economical. He could not help thinking that there were some who viewed this Bill with very great misgivings, and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was accurate when he said that these misgivings were due to the fact that they foresaw a great addition to the burdens on the rates. It appeared to him that, if this Amendment were passed, it would only be a sample of what they might expect in future. [Cheers.] That cheer undoubtedly foreshadowed that this proposal, if carried, would be followed by another to pay members not only their expenses, but for their services on the Councils. He saw that there was already on the Paper Notice of an Amendment, the object of which was the payment of the Chairman. But if the Chairman was to be paid, why not the County Councillors? Undoubtedly the effect of this Amendment would be greatly to burden the rates, and further greatly to increase corruption and jobbery. He trusted the Government did not intend that this point should be reserved, and he hoped they would put down their foot against it in order that a settlement of the question might be at once arrived at.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, that he had no difficulty in understanding the position the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had taken up, and the feeling on the opposite side of the House which he now represented with regard to the Bill as a whole. The hon. Gentleman said that he viewed this Bill with great misgiving; that being so, it was perfectly natural that he should resist a proposal, the effect of which would be to make the Bill what the framers had expressed their desire that it should be—namely, an effective means of bringing into the County Councils representatives of all classes. He was amused at the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. The right hon. Gentleman sympathized entirely with the object with which this Amendment was framed; but he opposed it because it was the thin end of the wedge. He (Mr. John Morley) wondered whether any proposal had ever been brought before the House or the country, however beneficent and wise, which had not been condemned, especially by the Party opposite, as the thin edge of the wedge. He did not discuss whether it was, or it was not, the thin edge of the wedge; but the argument of the right hon. Gentleman was no dissuasive from supporting the Amendment. The question was not whether Members of that House should ultimately be paid. That question was one which, no doubt, would be raised one of these days, probably an early day, and when it came before them they would know how to deal with it. The present proposal was a very much smaller one. It was not a proposal to pay members of County Councils for their services; it was merely a proposal to enable a certain class of men, whose services the Government admitted they desired to have on these Councils, and whose knowledge would be a public advantage, to enable them to take part in the government of their districts. There were considerable bodies of men interested in these proposals, miners and labourers, and there were, he thought, in some of the poorer counties, considerable bodies of farmers to whom it would be a consideration and a real object to be spared the expense of going three or four times a-year from their own localities to the place where the County Councils were held. Again, there were in many counties ministers and clergymen of the Church of England, whose services the Government had admitted they were desirous of having on these Councils, to whom these travelling expenses would be undoubtedly an object. If the Government were to be consistent in carrying out the principle of the Bill he could not see how they could fail in supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland). The right hon. Gentleman had said they did not pay the expenses of members of Boards of Guardians, School Boards, and other Local Authorities. However right that may have been formerly, they were now creating Bodies of much wider scope and importance; and what might have been a very wise and necessary exception in the case of smaller Bodies might be perfectly unwise and undesirable in the case of the Bodies which they were now about to create. His hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham had already stated, with reference to his Amendment, that there might be one or two additions that might be made to it. He (Mr. John Morley) thought it might be desirable to limit the concession of travelling expenses to the journey strictly from the place where the men resided to the seat of the County Council—he meant that the members should not be entitled, if they were in London, for instance, to claim expenses for the whole of the journey to the County Councils. But all these were matters of detail, which he believed his hon. Friend was willing to meet, and it only remained for him (Mr. John Morley) to say that if his hon. Friend went to a Division he would cordially support the Amendment.

MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon) said, there was one matter in connection with this subject on which the Committee were left in doubt—namely, the fund out of which this payment was to come. They were not told in the Amendment whether it was to come out of the rate of the whole county, or whether it was to be met from the rates of the particular district for which the County Councillor was returned. He thought this a most important consideration, and that the matter ought to have been set forth clearly on the face of the Amendment, because it seemed to him monstrous to suppose that a body of the ratepayers at one end of the county should be asked to support a County Councillor who came from another part of the county, and who might represent a very different interest indeed from that of the main body. He could not imagine a proposition which would be more distasteful to the main body of the ratepayers than this. He was only too glad that the Government put down their foot firmly against this proposal. They had been plainly and honestly told in the course of the debate that this was but the beginning of what hon. Members opposite hoped to come about in the end. Hon. Members had shown that this was clearly the thin end of the wedge, and that they were only to look at this as the beginning of the proposal, and that if the principle were admitted not only County Councillors but Members of Parliament would have to be paid for their services. He trusted that this would be distinctly understood, not only inside the House, but that every ratepayer throughout the country would know what was going on. [Cheers.] He was glad to hear those cheers, because at every public meeting which he had addressed he found that the ratepayers had taken a very considerable interest in this question of payment of expenses, and because this was only one of the Amendments out of many which, if they were carried, would add enormously to the expense of the working of the Bill. They had in that House at the present time Gentlemen who had been sent up by some of the great trade bodies in the North, and if it should be the case that the great Trade Unions in the North should wish to send members of their body to the County Councils, he knew that the County Councils would most gladly welcome them. If those men were sent they would be paid for by those whose special interest they represented. In that case, why should this claim be made on their behalf? He, for one, agreed with the Government in resisting the Motion, and he protested against the attempt to cast this burden on the ratepayers.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, he feared that hon. Members opposite did not really understand the object of the Amendment. The object was to diminish the burdens borne by the ratepayers by enabling them to send poor men to the County Councils; the idea being that poor men would scrutinize the expenditure which rich men were prone to sanction. He must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board on the speech he had just made. It was conceived on fine old Tory lines. It was precisely that kind of speech they so often heard in that House from Tory Ministers when Liberal measures were proposed. The right hon. Gentleman commenced by expressing his strong sympathy with the objects of the proposal; he then said, "but,"—and he (Mr. Labouchere) then knew perfectly well what was coming. He had heard the argument used again and again. The proposed change, the right hon. Gentleman intimated, was not a change which ought to be introduced at that particular moment. "Bring in a Bill dealing with the subject generally," the Representative of the Government always said on these occasions, "and then we will consider it." Would the Government give facilities to him to bring in a Bill to enable every Member of Parliament to be paid his expenses during the time the House was sitting? If the right hon. Gentleman would do that, he would engage to bring in such a Bill; but he knew then that the counter argument would be used. The Government would say then—"We must learn by experience what would be the effect of the change, it will be better to try it in a single case, and then we shall see the result." That was always how Her Majesty's present Ministry met any proposal which might be brought forward on the Liberal side of the House, either in Committee or in general discussion on a Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said there was no precedent for such a proposal as this. Was the right hon. Gentleman not aware that in times gone by—those fine old times Conservatives were so fond of alluding to—in times gone by Members had received payment for their expenses up to London and for their expenses while in London, and, what was more, they did not receive it from the Imperial Exchequer, but received it, as suggested in the present Amendment, from the local rates. Therefore, there was no new precedent in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman ought to know that a Member of the House of Lords had got a right, a legal right, whenever he came to fulfil his duties in Parliament, to step aside into the New Forest—probably the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) occasionally saw Peers strutting about the New Forest—a Member of the House of Lords had a legal right, on his coming to Parliament, to step aside into any of Her Majesty's forests and to kill a buck. He and his hon. Friends merely wished to apply to the case of the poor men who were sent to County Councils a principle which applied to the Peers of the Realm. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to him not to have read his own Bill, for he said—"You will have to extend it to other cases, to burial boards, and highway boards." Why, did the right hon. Gentleman not know that his own Bill did away with burial boards and highway boards? The right hon. Gentleman finished by protesting against what he called "extravagance and expense." He seemed to think extravagance and expense were entirely identical; that as this would involve expense, it would, therefore, involve extravagance. He (Mr. Labouchere) admitted it would involve, primarily, expense; but the great object in view was to enable people to send men to the County Councils who would prevent extravagance.

SIR CHARLES LEWIS (Antrim, N.) said, he desired to draw the attention of the Committee to the singular fact that this Amendment was vague in the extreme. They might believe it was intended to be vague; it provided that—

"Every Councillor shall be entitled to claim a sum in payment of the expenses, if any, actually and reasonably incurred by him in travelling to and from the place of meeting of the Council."

Nothing was said about the meetings of the committees of which there would be very many. It seemed to him it might well be within the terms of this Amendment that members of the Council coming to and from the Council upon any public business might claim their expenses. So far with regard to the vagueness of the language of the Amendment. With regard to the principle of the Amendment, he thought that all of them must be glad that in this country we had hitherto avoided the dangers and corruptions from which municipal institutions in the United States, had suffered. The whole difference between the practice in the United States, and in this country was that public men in England had hitherto always been distinguished by the fact that they had given their services; whereas in America the contrary rule had prevailed, members of public bodies being paid for the services they rendered. It had been freely admitted that those who were the strongest supporters of this proposal desired that there should not only be a payment for expenses, but also a payment for loss of time. The payment of members would, in his opinion, sap the foundation of political and municipal life, and, therefore, he should give to the proposal his strenuous opposition.

MR. BURT (Morpeth) said, he did not know whether the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Lewis) had been remarkable for the characteristic of desiring always to work for nothing. However, he (Mr. Burt) wished to say a few words on the general question now before the Committee. He thought his hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. A. Acland) had done good service by bringing the subject forward. The proposal seemed to him to be a very moderate one, and the hon. Gentleman stated very clearly and strongly the reasons which induced him to make it. Now, he (Mr. Burt) did not consider that the Bill they were discussing was in any sense a Radical measure. It professed to be so, but many of its provisions were calculated rather to diminish than to extend direct popular representation on municipal bodies in the country. He felt that unless some provision of the kind suggested was inserted in the Bill, the Bill would go very far in the direction he had indicated. For instance, his hon. Friend the Member for the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland (Mr. Fenwick) pointed out that at the present time workmen had direct representation on Local Boards and Town Councils and school boards. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board laid stress upon the want of precedent. But there was a precedent, although it might be a small one. He believed it was the case that Boards of Guardians had the power to pay the representatives whom they might send to conferences upon Poor Law questions. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the case of Local Boards and Town Councils and Boards of Guardians. He (Mr. Burt) was bound to point out that in the case of Town Councils, and in the case of school boards also, the members lived within a comparatively short distance of the meeting place, but the membership of County Councils would necessitate a very considerable amount of travelling and a good deal of expenditure. His one very decided feeling was that the representation would be in a very large measure confined to the well-to-do classes unless some such Amendment as that under consideration were adopted. Very kindly and friendly references had been made to the workmen who had Representatives at the present time in the House of Commons. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the Ripon Division of Yorkshire (Mr. Wharton) declared that the Trades Unions of the North had their Representatives here, and he was good enough to say that the Members of the House were very glad to welcome those Representatives, and to have them amongst them. [Ministerial cheers.] He was very glad to hear that assenting cheer, for it quite accorded with the treatment he himself had received during the whole period he had had the honour of a seat in the House. But the Trades Unions were not represented. The Members who were called labour Members were elected, and they came into the House of Commons exactly on the same footing as any other Member. They came as politicians; they appealed to the electors as politicians, and whatever might be their connection with, and, however, qualified they might be to represent the workmen on special labour questions, not one of them would be here if it were not for his political opinions. The other arguments which had been addressed to the Committee had been so completely dealt with by his hon. Friend the junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) that he did not need to enter upon them.

Sir Charles Lewis

In conclusion, he had only to say that if there was not a precedent, as the President of the Local Government Board said there was not, the time had come when a precedent should be made. He quite agreed that they were, to a large extent, endeavouring to assert a new principle. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might depend upon it that this was a proposal which would be made in the House again and again until it was, as it would be before long, carried to a successful issue.

MR. MILVAIN (Durham) said, he objected to the spirit and the principle of this Amendment. The expense of the representatives going to the Council meetings had been referred to as only a moderate expense, and that, therefore, they might get in the thin edge of the wedge. But he objected entirely to admitting the thin edge of the wedge when they ought not to admit the thick end of the wedge. What he maintained about the principle of admitting paid representatives to any representative assembly was that it would create so many individual prizes for the ablest and most unscrupulous demagogue who could catch what he believed to be the popular vote of the mob. Upon that ground alone he objected to the principle of the Amendment. The immediate Amendment before the Committee was, according to the professions of the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. A. Acland), to enable working men and lower-class tradesmen to take a greater interest in politics and the affairs of their county. He asked, assuming they were not paid their travelling expenses, was there anything to prevent their taking that interest in the affairs of their county and of their country by voting for men whom they thought fit to represent them on the County Council? He thought not; and what was more, he believed that, no matter what it was—insignificant or not insignificant—the expense of going to and returning from the County Council would not deter a man of honour and virtue from seeking election and obtaining representation. He denied altogether that this matter had been placed before the electorate yet. He denied that there was any demand for the payment of representatives; and he maintained—and he was prepared to be judged by his words—that where there had been such a demand, the demand was rapidly diminishing. He asked, why were we to pay the members of County Councils, or of any other representative assembly, when they could get the services of men of equal honour, of equal ability, and of equal education, who were prepared to do the work without a single penny of remuneration? The services rendered by the County Magistrates up to the present time in conducting the financial business of the counties had been rendered gratuitously, and no one would deny that that business had been conducted with efficiency and economy. What more could they expect from hon. Members who sought to be paid for their services upon County Councils? Let him put before the Committee the case of two persons seeking election to a County Council. Let them suppose that the men were of equal honour, equal ability, and of equal virtue—that one was prepared to do the service gratuitously, while the other sought to be paid for his services. Why, he asked, were they to saddle imperatively upon the ratepayers the additional expense of paying for the performance of services when they could be equally ably, equally efficiently, and equally economically performed by a person without the payment of his expenses? What was the foundation of the Bill—upon what principle was the Bill formed? The principle of the Bill was that taxation and representation should go hand-in-hand; and the ratepayers believed, and the counties believed, that if they had their representatives upon a Council supervising the expenditure of the revenue of the county, it would be conducted with greater economy than at present. But why, if economy was the object of the Bill, were they going to begin by saddling the ratepayers with a rate for the payment of the travelling expenses of the representatives? This Amendment would defeat the very object of the Bill from an economical point of view; and, furthermore, he maintained that paid representatives were not representatives who were calculated to conduct the business of counties with efficiency.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) thought the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Milvain) had made it very obvious why he opposed the principle of this Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman approved entirely of the existing administration of counties by magistrates, which, he said, was gratuitous. But the object of this Bill was to remove the administration of the counties from that particular class of which the hon. and learned Gentleman entirely approved, and to throw open the administration of the counties to all classes of the community. Yet the hon. and learned Gentleman objected to an Amendment which was absolutely necessary in order to admit every class of the community into that administration, so, in point of fact, what he objected to was that the Amendment would not keep up such a condition of things as would confine the administration of the counties in the future to the same class of people who had monopolized it in the past. The hon. and learned Gentleman had made quite plain the real basis of his objection.

MR. MILVAIN said, he was sure the right hon. Gentleman would pardon him for interrupting him. He did not say, neither did he infer what the right hon. Gentleman had attributed to him. What he said was, that the necessary expense of coming to and from the County Councils would not deter any man of honour and virtue from seeking a seat.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had the highest opinion of honour and virtue, but he did not see that they defrayed travelling expenses; but he would not pursue that point. The hon. and learned Gentleman put a suppositional case; he said there would be presented to the ratepayers two men for election, they were to be of equal honour and virtue and of equal capacity, one of them could pay his own travelling expenses and the other could not. Surely, it was for the ratepayers to determine which they would elect. This Amendment would not compel the ratepayers to elect a man of honour and virtue who could not pay his own travelling expenses; it left to the ratepayers the option. [MR. MILVAIN: No, no!] Yes, it did.

MR. MILVAIN asked the right hon. Gentleman to forgive him, the right hon. Gentleman was not present when this Amendment was moved.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was.

MR. MILVAIN said, he begged the right hon. Gentleman's pardon, he did not think he was present. Anyhow, the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division

(Mr. Fenwick) seconded the Amendment, and also insisted upon the payment being imperative, as was shown by the Amendment which followed the present one.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that he was speaking to the present Amendment, and the present Amendment did not make it compulsory that everybody should receive payment. It would be perfectly well known to the ratepayers whether the person they elected was or was not a person who would be likely to require to make a claim for payment. The ratepayers, therefore, had a free choice whether they would incur this expenditure or not. If they incurred this expenditure, and paid the cost of the travelling of a representative, when they might take a man who would not require his travelling expenses to be paid, it would be because they believed that the poor man would answer their purposes better, would represent their opinion better than the richer man. Therefore, this question of saddling the ratepayer against his will with unnecessary expense was one of those bogus arguments which were always raised against reform. The ratepayers would be perfectly able to judge, and they would be perfectly competent to judge whether or not it was worth their while, and convenient to their interests to elect a man whose travelling expenses they would have to pay. That was all the present Amendment proposed. He thought it was a perfectly reasonable Amendment; he thought it was an Amendment entirely in conformity with the professed object of the Bill—namely, that the representatives of all interests should come upon these County Councils, and he for one would give it his cordial support.

MR. FENWICK said, he did not wish to occupy the time of the Committee more than a few minutes, but he desired it to be distinctly understood that he did not second the Amendment of the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. A. Acland), but that he had put down an Amendment to that Amendment. He was not sure whether he would be in Order in moving his Amendment now. In his opinion the Amendment of his hon. Friend did not put the question sufficiently forcibly—to his mind, at least—before the Committee. What he wished was that it should be imperative upon each member of the Council to receive payment. He was sure no Member on the Opposition side of the House would charge the hon. and learned Member for the City of Durham (Mr. Milvain) with being a demagogue or with in any way attempting to catch the vote of the mob. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed, however, to insinuate that some of the Members on the Opposition side of the House were in the habit of doing such a thing. He (Mr. Fenwick) uttered his most unqualified protest against any such insinuation. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Ripon Division of Yorkshire (Mr. Wharton) asked them why, if a Trade's Union was disposed to force one of its members upon a constituency, another portion of the community should be compelled to pay the expenses of that member? The answer was very simple—namely, that the other portion of the community would probably have a member of its own whose opinions were different from those of the members of the Trade's Union who sent a working man to the Council meeting. The Trade's Union, as the hon. and learned Gentleman was pleased to term it, would have to pay, under this Amendment, a portion of the expenses of the representative of their opponents. The burden, therefore, would be equally divided. The President of the Local Government Board had said there was no precedent for the payment of such services, but the hon. Gentleman must have forgotten that we paid the members of Royal Commissions their travelling expenses when they were called upon to perform services in the interests of the nation. The services of the County Councillors were analogous to those which Royal Commissions were called upon to give. He very much regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had met this Amendment with a non possumus, because what was asked for was a very moderate concession indeed. As he pointed out in the course of the debate the other night the effect of the Bill without the Amendment would be practically to disenfranchise a large number of working men who now served on Town Councils, on Boards of Guardians, and on school boards. Let him instance the case arising in his own Division. There, probably, half of the members of the Local Board were working men. That was in a purely working class constituency, and if the Committee did not accept the principle of his Amendment, they would certainly debar these men from taking any part whatever in the Local Government of their own district. Though the working classes were five-sixths of the population they would be compelled to take as their representative a man whose sympathies were not in harmony with their own. He regretted exceedingly that the President of the Local Government Board had not seen his way to accept the principle of this Amendment. If he was in Order he would move his Amendment now.

Question put.

MR. J. S. GATHORNE-HARDY (Kent, Medway) said, he rose to move the insertion at the end of the clause of the words—

He knew there was a great objection, as there had always been, to there being ex officio members of any board; and he, for his own part, had always had a certain sympathy with that objection, and on Boards of Guardians, wherever he found the elected members taking a strong part, he had always hesitated to offer any opposition to their wishes. But with regard to the provision that Members of Parliament should be members of the County Council, he did not think the statement that they were to be ex officio members was quite a true statement. As a matter of fact, they were elected by the ratepayers of the county for the very highest office it was in the power of the ratepayers to appoint them to, and there could be no doubt, he thought, that if a person who was a member for the county, or for a division of the county were to come forward as a candidate for the County Council he would be elected. With regard to this Amendment he was able to say what the mover of no other Amendment probably would be able to say. He would have the practically unanimous opinion of the Committee that Members of Parliament were, at all events, fit and proper persons to sit upon the County Councils. He took it that there was no Member of the Committee who had not that confidence in his own abilities to think that he was competent to sit upon a County Council. He (Mr. J. S. Gathorne-Hardy) thought a Member of Parliament was not only a fit and proper person to sit upon a County Council, but one who ought to sit upon such a Council; and it was an extremely hard matter in these days that a person in that position should be forced to fight two contested elections in order to obtain two positions for which he was eminently qualified. He had heard that the opinion had been expressed that this Amendment might be accepted were the Member to sit upon the County Council, but to have no vote. He did not at all agree to that proposition, for, in his opinion, it would be an extremely mischievous one. The fact that a Member of Parliament was entitled to sit on the County Council without voting would very much militate against his being elected, if he thought fit to come forward as a candidate for any division. Voters would say he had already got a seat on the Board, and they might refuse to vote for him if he came forward as a candidate. Under such circumstances, Members of Parliament would really be put into the position of servants of the County Councils rather than of efficient members of it; therefore, he could not assent to any such suggestion. He earnestly hoped the Committee would take this Amendment into serious consideration. He was sure that, unless hon. Members were very different from himself, there were not many of them anxious to fight more contested elections than they were obliged to. He was confident hon. Members would agree with him that County Members and the Members for boroughs were fit and proper persons to sit upon the new County Councils, and that, indeed, they ought to be on the Councils. He thought that when a man was elected by the ratepayers to the highest position in which they could place him, he might be relied upon to represent them fairly upon the County Council.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 5, at end, insert (e) "The Members of Parliament for the divisions of the county and of the boroughs therein shall be ex officio members of the County Council."—(Mr. J. S. Gathorne-Hardy.)

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.) said, that the great charm of this Bill in the opinion of everyone was, he thought, that from beginning to end there were to be no ex officio element under it. Personally, he was very glad to find from what the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie), in explaining the Bill, had said that there was no loophole by which any ex officio element might be introduced. To his mind, it was a question whether Members of Parliament would make the best members of County Councils; there would be a great deal of work to do, and he knew that a Member of Parliament who attended Westminster regularly could not also attend regularly to county business. If he were to put himself forward, and to be elected as a County Councillor, it would be a question with him whether he could be of more use in the House of Commons or in the County Councils; certainly he could not discharge both duties efficiently. He did not wish to detain the Committee on this question; but still, as this suggestion had come from the Ministerial side of the House, he desired to say that, as far as he was concerned, the suggestion of the hon. Member was one which ought not to be entertained, because he believed mischief would arise if any ex officio element were introduced into the County Councils in any shape or form.

MR. RITCHIE said, he hoped that his hon. Friend (Mr. J. S. Gathorne-Hardy) would not press this Amendment. He entirely agreed with what his hon. Friend the Member for North Somerset (Mr. Llewellyn) had said—namely, that it would be most inconvenient, if they were to accept this Amendment, to give an expression of their opinion that there should still be retained the ex officio element upon these Councils. He felt very little doubt that Members of Parliament who were the Representatives of counties could very easily become members of these Councils in the proper way, if they desired to do so; but it would be an invidious distinction to say that certain gentlemen should have the right to be members of County Councils.

Mr. J. S. Gathorne-Hardy

He did not think it would add to the efficiency of the Councils, neither did he think it would really tend in the direction his hon. Friend (Mr. J. S. Gathorne-Hardy) desired. He therefore trusted his hon. Friend would not press the Amendment.

MR. J. S. GATHORNE-HARDY said, that, of course, after the remarks of the President of the Local Government Board, he would not press his Amendment.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that, no doubt, to the Amendment, as drawn, there was considerable objection, because it was quite possible to conceive that men would become members of Councils in counties in which they had no stake whatever. Of course, it frequently happened that a man was elected to represent a county or a division of a county or a borough with which he was in no way otherwise connected. If his hon. Friend would consent to the insertion of the words "and otherwise qualified" after the word "therein," he (Mr. Chaplin) must say he could not for his own part agree to the objection which had been raised to the proposal. Everybody desired that the best men in a borough or a county, as the case might be, should become members of the Council. He thought it was very exceptional indeed if a man, who had undergone a hotly contested Parliamentary election, were willing to undergo, immediately afterwards, another equally hotly contested election for the County Council. He was told it would be impossible for Members of the House of Commons to do their duty upon these Councils; but what did they see in the House? Over and over again they saw among county Members men who were the most regular attendants in the House, men who never missed a Division, but were always in their place, yet, somehow or other, they managed to attend Quarter Sessions also. He could name Gentlemen who attended here most regularly, but who had never missed a Quarter Session in their lives. He supposed, however, that there was no use in arguing the matter if the Government were not willing to accept the proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Gentleman withdraw the Amendment?

MR. J. S. GATHORNE-HARDY said, he had no objection to withdraw it; but he totally differed from the opinions expressed in regard to it. It was one thing to have ex officio members appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of the county, and a totally different thing for the electors of the county to elect their own ex officio members of the Council.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton) said, that the object of the Amendment he had put upon the Paper was to endow County Councillors with the functions of Justices of the Peace, and he proposed it because he believed it would, at all events, afford a partial remedy for what was, at the present time, a very great grievance. The present system of appointing Justices of the Peace was unsatisfactory to those Gentlemen who had an honourable aspiration to attain such a position, and it was also unsatisfactory to the people at large. That dissatisfaction had frequently found expression at the meetings of the Trades Unions Congresses, and it had also found expression, from time to time, in the House of Commons. It was very desirable that all classes should have confidence in, and respect for, our Courts of Petty Sessions; and he held that in order to secure that, Justices of the Peace should be men of all classes. The present system of nomination and property qualification was a system by which class was set against class, because it inferred the idea that there was a class of rich men who were entitled to rule, and that there was a class of poor men whose fate it was to be ruled over. That, he maintained, was entirely inconsistent with our present democratic institutions. What was the result of appointing only men of property and nominees of the Crown to the magistracy? It was this, that offences against property were dealt with with a severity out of all proportion to the measure of justice which was meted out for offences against the person. Every day one observed in the newspapers reports of the extraordinary sentences which were given for trivial offences against property, and the attention of the House was frequently called to them. He had made a collection of these reports, and he believed they had been published in a pamphlet; they were certainly most striking. He tried to ascertain whether there was any rhyme or reason for these sentences. He did not wish to enlarge upon them; but the calculation at which he had arrived was that the average cost of indulging in the luxury of kicking one's wife, and blackening her eye, or pouring hot water over her, or biting a piece out of a policeman, was about 10s.; whereas, on the other hand, the cost of stealing a pocket-handkerchief, or a cotton shirt, or any similar article, was a term of imprisonment, varying from two or three months to five years penal servitude; and should, by any accident, a labouring man be found in possession of a dirty rabbit net he had better be tried by a court martial at once than by a bench of rural magistrates. He knew that the objection which would be urged against his Amendment was that it would be a system of elected magistrates; but the system was nothing new in this country. Mayors of boroughs were elected at the present time; in Scotland the baillies were elected; moreover, coroners were elected officers, and were ex-officio magistrates, and there were places where the Aldermen and Portreeves were also elected, and also exercised the functions of magistrates. At the present time Magistrates were elected, not by the people, but elected by a small clique of wirepullers. Most hon. Members knew how these gentlemen were elected; the Party wirepullers of those who were in power at the time selected, generally from among themselves, some gentlemen whom they wished to endow with the dignity of magistrates, and they sent up the names of these gentlemen through what was termed the ordinary channels to the Lord Chancellor, and then the Lord Chancellor went through the farce of sending to the Town Council to know whether the gentlemen nominated were acceptable or not to them. If the Town Council happened to say that they objected to these gentlemen, and to suggest anybody else, then the Lord Chancellor said that they were going outside their province; and he, in fact, snubbed them. This sort of thing had taken place over and over again; it had taken place within recent times at Winchester, West Ham, Poole, Wrexham, Hanley, Bradford, and other places. And then, to wind up this comedy, some Gentleman generally got up in the House and asked a Question of the Home Secretary, and that right hon. Gentleman was content to use the tu quoque argument, that it had been done by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he did not see why they should not do the same thing. If he (Mr. Seale-Hayne) were to endeavour to touch upon how magistrates were elected in the counties, he might perhaps be proceeding beyond his depth. A portion of the county magistracy might be regarded as hereditary. Some of the county magistrates had no claim to a seat on the Bench other than that their fathers had sat there before; others had acquired the dignity by purchase, as it frequently happened that if a gentleman came into the county, and bought a large estate, he was straightway put on the Bench, irrespective of any personal qualification. Other gentlemen got on the Bench simply because they happened to be of the same political complexion as the Lord Lieutenant; they merely took the position because it gave them a certain amount of social position, and got them into the charmed circle of county society. Now, he could not believe that this was a satisfactory way of appointing gentlemen to exercise the important functions of Justices of the Peace. Then, let him say a word in regard to the general objection that those who exercised judicial functions should not be elected. He was perfectly ready to admit that it would be a great evil if the Judges of the land were elected, because they had to deal with large pecuniary interests, and because it was necessary they should have great legal learning and experience.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) rose to Order, and asked the Chairman whether the hon. Gentleman was in Order in discussing the present method of appointing magistrates?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that inasmuch as there was a provision in the clause respecting the Chairmen of County Councils, he was not prepared to say that it was not permissible to discuss the proposition that members of County Councils should also be ex-officio Justices. But the hon. Member was certainly supporting his proposition with arguments a long way beyond the necessity of the case.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE said, he bowed to the Chairman's decision. He had been merely enlarging upon the question of the existing evils, and he had started by saying that he advocated his Amendment because it afforded a partial remedy, as he believed, for those evils. Now, Judges were in a different position also to Justices of the Peace, because they had, on matters of fact, a jury to assist them. Justices of the Peace, on the other hand, had to be both Judge and jury in their own Courts. He held, therefore, that the two cases were entirely different, and that the same arguments did not apply to them. The objection might be urged that these elections might degenerate into a Party fight. Well, he had no doubt that that might be so in some instances, but he did not think it would be of such frequent occurrence as hon. Members in the course of this debate had assumed. His answer to that was this. Were not nominations at the present time—especially of borough magistrates—entirely political, and if there was to be a political fight over the appointment of Magistrates, was it not better that that fight should be carried on in open day, and not on the backstairs of the Lord Lieutenants and in the back parlours of the wirepullers in the boroughs? He believed that in these elections of the County Councillors, if they were endowed with the dignity of Justice of the Peace, it would bring out far better men. It might be said—"What evidence have you that the elected magistrates will be as good as those who sit on the Bench at the present time?" Well, his answer was that no evidence was required. His position was this—that if the decisions of the elected Magistrates were bad, at the end of six years the ratepayers would be able to get rid of them, and that, under the existing system, if the decisions of nominated Magistrates were bad, there was no means of getting rid of them. The people were saddled with them for all time. He (Mr. Seale-Hayne) felt convinced, speaking on this subject with some knowledge as a county and borough magistrate, that if the Government would confer upon elected Councillors the dignity of justice of the peace, not only would better men come forward as candidates, but they would do much to strengthen the hands of the law by giving more confidence to the people in the impartiality of our Petty Sessional Courts. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, after line 5, to insert—" (e) They shall, by virtue of their office, be justices of the peace for the county."—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, the Chairman had stated that in his opinion both the Amendment and the speech in which the hon. Member had put it before the Committee came very near being outside the Bill, and certainly, under the circumstances, he (Mr. Ritchie) should not inflict any lengthened remarks upon the Committee with reference to this question, which, to his mind, was altogether outside the four corners of the Bill. He would appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, whom he believed were desirous of passing this measure, or a measure of the kind, to limit somewhat their observations and their Amendments to what might fairly be considered to come within the scope of the provisions of the Bill; because it was evident, if they were to discuss on the Bill such fundamental changes as those sought to be introduced by the hon. Member, there would scarcely be any limit to the period of time necessary to spend on the measure. He need hardly say that the Government could not assent to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman. He regarded it as not only a thing bad in itself, but, as he had said, outside the provisions of the Bill altogether. The Chairman had told them that there was a provision in the measure which gave colour to the Amendment—the provision that the Chairman of the County Council should be a Justice of the Peace—but in that the Government had followed strictly the analogy of the Municipal Corporations Act. The Chairman of a Town Council in that case, that was to say, the Mayor of a town, was a Justice of the Peace. That was the analogy the Government had followed; but to propose that County Councillors should also be Justices of the Peace was a suggestion altogether outside the analogy to the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act. He would appeal to the Committee to be good enough not to spend any lengthened time in discussing the matter, which was clearly beyond the scope of the measure.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not think it necessary to press this Amendment to a Division, although I am bound to say I think he is perfectly justified in placing it before the Committee. I am very willing to take this opportunity of saying that, whether in this form or in some other form, it is absolutely necessary that a change should be made in this matter as affecting both boroughs and counties. The present system is simply a scandal. Magistrates in boroughs, and still more so in counties, are appointed without the smallest reference to their fitness for their judicial duties. They are appointed simply out of political considerations—

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I rise to Order, Sir. I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in the observations he is making?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The system is perfectly indefensible. I dare say the noble Lord and his Friends do not like to hear these things; but, if he will allow me to say so, that is exactly why I state them. In my opinion, it is clear that a reform must come. It will come, I believe, through the County Councils. I would not recommend my hon. Friend to press his Amendment on this occasion, because I feel quite certain that when these County Councils are formed, they will ultimately demand that they should have a voice, and a potent voice, in the appointment of the Magistracy. It is quite impossible where a power like this Council Council is established, which is to be representative of the public opinion of the county, that they will any longer tolerate the administration of Justice in counties being dependent on the nomination of the Lord Lieutenant. That power has been, and is at this time, so grossly abused that it must be reformed. [A laugh.] The hon. Member who laughs I dare say is himself a magistrate appointed by a Lord Lieutenant. Doubtless for that reason he has a very high opinion of the nominations. But I have observed this matter, and I have some means of knowing about these appointments, and the manner in which justice is administered under them, and I would, therefore, ask my hon. Friend to rest content with the certainty that in the future, when this power which we have been frankly told is to be a democratic power, is established under this Bill, one of the effects, which I hope will be beneficial effects, will be a complete revolution in the system of appointing magistrates both in counties and boroughs. Under the circumstances, I would ask my hon. Friend not to press his Amendment to a Division.

MR. A. J. WILLIAMS (Glamorgan-shire, S.) said, that considering the observations of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, he could not refrain from expressing his entire approval of the spirit of the Amendment before the Committee. He (Mr. Williams) had ventured himself to put upon the Notice Paper an Amendment which would have involved the principle which the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt), with a truly prophetic spirit, declared would be adopted as soon as they got these County Councils into working order. He had put upon the Paper an Amendment in the spirit of the clause in the Act of 1835, which proposed to give—and he was sure they would soon have it—the power to nominate justices for the county to direct representatives of the people. He ventured to rise on this occasion because there was no part of the United Kingdom in which this scandal was more disgraceful than in the Principality of Wales. He had taken some pains of late to find out what was the composition of the Bench in the various counties of Wales. He need not say that there was only one class there. He looked in vain amongst the magistracy in some counties for members of the Nonconformist Body, and he looked in vain for members of the trading classes. He should have liked to have seen some chance of pressing this Amendment to a successful issue—he honestly confessed he should have liked to take part in such an attempt. What would be the state of things under this Bill in his division if this Amendment were passed? Why, in the division for which he was a Member, and in which he was a justice, he would, at all events, have the satisfaction of finding one or two farmers, certainly one or two tradesmen, sitting by his side on the bench. He was not at all sure that they were wise even at this stage in refraining from pressing the Amendment to a Division.

MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell) said, he desired to say a word to the Committee, not for the purpose of delaying the discussion on the Bill, but merely to state that he sympathized to a great extent with what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. Seale-Hayne), and that he agreed that the present method of appointing magistrates was a crying scandal; but he should, however, feel himself bound most strongly to oppose the Amendment, if the hon. Member sought to force it to a Division. He could not imagine anything that would be more likely to have a disastrous effect upon the respect of the English people for law than the proposal to submit those who were to administer the law from time to time to the turmoil of contested elections. He should very strongly support, and he hoped very shortly to have an opportunity of supporting an Amendment which was to be moved by the hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare), which would give the County Councils about to be appointed the power of nominating the magistrates, or, at any rate, of recommending magistrates for nomination; but he should feel it impossible to support the proposal that magistrates should be appointed by popular election.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he was glad the Government had determined not to assent to the proposal before the Committee, because he would point out that, if they had done so, they would have given a preference to the County Councils over the Town Councils, which would have been most invidious. For the Amendment did not contemplate giving to Town Councils the appointment of justices, which it would accord to members of County Councils. He would also point out that the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was a good one—namely, that as a general rule, they should endeavour to follow the main lines of the Municipal Corporations Act. He thought on that ground, therefore, the attitude the right hon. Gentleman had taken up was eminently satisfactory. He was glad to hear the protest of the hon. Member for St. Austell (Mr. W. A. M'Arthur) that in this country the people were determined to adhere to the principle that our Judges and Justices of the Peace should not be elected. The hon. Member had spoken of his experience of one part of the world, and he (Sir Albert Rollit) had had experience of another. No one could become aware of what took place in those countries where elective Judges existed, without a lively knowledge of the fact that not unfrequently people went into politics to get a Judge made in order that he might afterwards decide a certain case. Such a principle as that was not one which this country was likely to yield a ready assent to. It was pointed out that this principle of making an elected Councillor a magistrate was carried out in the case of the chairman of a Town Council—that was to say the mayor of a borough. He ventured to think on that matter, that if there was one point on which the Mayors of boroughs had been less successful than another, it had been in regard to the performance of their judicial duties. He had heard of one Mayor who, at the very commencement of his term of office, declared that during the period he sat on the bench, it should be his constant endeavour neither to be partial nor impartial. He (Sir Albert Rollit) did not know whether that effort succeeded or not, but that was his extraordinary declaration, and he (Sir Albert Rollit) did not think it would be difficult to find other illustrations of the peculiar fitness—or unfitness—of elected gentlemen to perform the delicate functions of the magistracy. The borough magistrates were, it was true, appointed in a manner to which some exception might occasionally be taken. On that point, at some other time—though he knew in saying this, he should lay himself open to the retort on the part of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt), that some of them on that (the Ministerial) side of the House were always prepared to do something or other, but never made an effort to begin—something no doubt should be done, as there was room for considerable improvement. But he would remind the Committee that even now improvement was taking place in the shape of the appointment of the Stipendiary Magistrates, though that system only existed in the boroughs, and had not been extended to the counties.

MR. RITCHIE desired to appeal to the hon. Member (Mr. Seale-Hayne) as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby had appealed to him, not to push this Amendment to a Division. It seemed to be the general wish of the Committee that the Amendment should be withdrawn, and he would therefore appeal to hon. Members, either to permit that course to be adopted, or to go to a Division at once, so that they might get to the consideration of questions which were of very great importance.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) said, that although the hon. Member for the St. Austell Division (Mr. W. A. M'Arthur) might not move his Amendment, he trusted that the suggestion of the hon. Member would not fall still-born, but that there would be an opportunity given to the Committee for considering this question again before the Committee stage was disposed of. It seemed to him (Mr. Illingworth) that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board should rather receive with favour than otherwise the proposal to entrust new duties to this grand creation of his, the County Councils, because by the announcement he had already made, he would be depriving them of such a large amount of work that they would really have very little to do. From a very wide experience in the North of England, he (Mr. Illingworth) could say that there was no scandal in connection with justice in this country so great as that with reference to the appointment of the magistracy in our boroughs and counties. In his own neighbourhood, magistrates had been put on the bench at the age of 21, merely because they happened to be the sons of prominent members of the dominant class, while leaving men on the other side in politics to be passed over. He spoke on this matter disinterestedly, and, therefore, he claimed some weight for his opinion, because he was neither a magistrate for a borough nor a county. It seemed to him that the work of the administration of justice in the country would be greatly improved, and that a much better feeling would be created throughout the towns and boroughs with regard to Courts of summary jurisdiction, if the Amendment proposed were adopted.

MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouthshire, W.) said, that before this Amendment was withdrawn, as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board wished to press the analogy of the Municipal Corporations Act, he should like to know whether the County Councils were going to be consulted with regard to the appointment of magistrates in the same way as the councillors or corporations were consulted with regard to the appointment of borough magistrates? And before the Amendment was withdrawn, allow him to say this—He did not think that there was any matter which people in the counties regarded as more important than that of the local administration of justice. There was no matter in regard to which people in the counties felt that a greater scandal existed. There was no doubt that there were many counties in England and in the Principality of Wales in which the people were entirely without a representative of their way of thinking upon the magisterial bench. If the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would say that the appointment of Justices of the Peace for the counties would henceforth be dealt with on the same lines as the appointment of the magistrates in boroughs, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman might then gracefully ask the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Seale-Hayne) to withdraw his Amendment; but until they had some such guarantee as that, they certainly had a right to complain of the present system and to endeavour in this Bill to bring about a more satisfactory state of things.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said, he desired to say that after the expression of opinion they had heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), he hoped that the Amendment would not be pressed to a Division. He trusted, however, that they would have some guarantee from the Government other than that to which allusion had been made by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. What he (Mr. Cremer) hoped Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House would contend for, and if necessary divide the House upon, was that power should be given to County Councils not merely to nominate, but to elect the magistrates. He thought nothing short of that would satisfy the people out of doors.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, that as his name had been mentioned in the course of this discussion, he desired to be allowed to say just one word. He was entirely in favour of the Amendment, and he thought the hon. Gentleman who submitted that Justices of the Peace should be elected was entirely right in his contention. He, however, was perfectly well aware—especially after the recommendation which had come from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby—that it would be perhaps better tactics on their part not to press the Amendment to a Division at the present moment. The hon. Member for the St. Austell Division (Mr. W. A. M'Arthur) had done him (Mr. Conybeare) the honour to refer to an Amendment which he had on the Paper, No. 126, which was as follows:—In Clause 2, p. 2, at end, to add—

“(6) From and after the passing of this Act every Justice of the Peace should be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of the County upon the recommendation of the County Council, and every parish should be entitled to nominate, and through the elected representatives on the County Council, to demand, the appointment of one or more of such persons as they may deem fit to act as resident Justices of the Peace for the said parishes. And the selected councillors should in every case be taken from among the local Justices of the Peace so nominated and appointed as aforesaid.”

He certainly concurred with the hon. Member in charge of the Amendment in his withdrawal of it, on the understanding, however, that it should not be summarily dismissed, or shut out by the Government from being again considered on his (Mr. Conybeare's) Amendment. He was not going to discuss that Amendment now, and he only wished to say in regard to the statement of the hon. Member for St. Austell that he did not concur in the sentiments he expressed as to its being a bad thing to elect people as Justices or “injustices” of the Peace. At any rate, the electing of magistrates could not place things in a worse condition than they were at present, because nothing could be more disgraceful and scandalous than the manner in which these functionaries were appointed at present.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE said, that before the discussion closed, it ought to be made clear that he and his Friends did not share in the grave attack made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby as to the administration of justice by the county magistrates.

The right hon. Gentleman for a long time had held the Office of Home Secretary, and was largely responsible for the appointment of many of the magistrates whom he attacked. Neither the right hon. Gentleman nor the Government to which he belonged had ever proposed to make any change in the mode of appointment of those gentlemen when in Office, but now in these later days apparently the right hon. Gentleman had become so accustomed to make attacks on the administration of justice in the Sister Island that he could not keep his fingers off the magistrates of this country. It was not, however, for him (Viscount Cranborne) to reprove the right hon. Gentleman, but he really thought that, considering the high office the right hon. Gentleman had held, he ought to think twice before, in the course of a debate like this, he levelled an attack upon the whole administration of justice throughout the country districts of England in the way he had done. Let it be clearly understood—and in saying that he was quite sure he spoke for all hon. Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side of the House—that they did not share the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, but entirely and absolutely repudiated them.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Perhaps it may relieve the anxiety of the noble Lord to inform him that I neither intended to, nor did I make an attack upon the administration of justice, though I attacked most strongly the method in which the county magistrates are appointed.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: The right hon. Gentleman will pardon me—[Cries of “Order!”]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I will state what I did say, or what I intended to say. I intended most strongly to attack the method in which the county magistrates are appointed.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: The right hon. Gentleman will pardon me. He not only attacked their appointment, but he spoke of many gross decisions they made.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I never said that, nor anything like it. I am quite certain that the noble Lord did not hear what I said.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE said, that in deference to the expression of opinion from that (the Opposition) side of the House, and from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, by the leave of the Committee he would withdraw his Amendment. He hoped, however, that at the same time he might be permitted to say this. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board complained that the Amendment travelled outside the scope of the Bill, and he (Mr. Seale-Hayne) would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he had a Bill before the House at the present time dealing with this special question, and that, therefore, if he withdrew this Amendment, he was entitled to have some facilities given to him for going on with that measure.

[Fifth Night.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) said, the next Amendment stood in his name, and was as follows:—in clause 2, page 2, after line 5, to insert, "Provided, that in the London County Council there shall be no selected councillors or aldermen." As he understood that it was considered that that Amendment could be more conveniently taken when the provisions dealing with London generally were discussed, he would, by the permission of the Committee, ask leave to postpone the Amendment until they came to Clause 36.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) said, that on this matter, he hoped that before the hon. Gentleman postponed the Amendment, the Government would give an undertaking, or give the Committee to understand that the whole question as to London, so far as it was affected by the clause, would be left open. He (Mr. Firth) hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would on this question take the opinion of hon. Members interested in London. Could the right hon. Gentleman say that the whole question as to Aldermen, who were not wanted in London—they cherished the few they had, but did not want any more—would be left open?

THE CHAIRMAN (interrupting): The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to go into this matter.

MR. WARMINGTON said, he now begged leave to move the Amendment which stood in his name—that was to say—in page 2, line 5, at end, to insert—

Mr. Seale-Hayne

"(e.) No person shall be capable of being elected as a member of more than one County Council."

This Amendment was in accordance with one which had been accepted by the Government, and moved by the hon. Member for one of the divisions of Somerset—

MR. FIRTH (interrupting) said, he wished as a matter of Order, to ask whether he was to understand from the Chairman that his Amendment was to be considered as withdrawn, because as yet he had said nothing about it.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Amendment was in the same category as that of the hon. Gentleman (Sir Roper Lethbridge), and would come more conveniently on Clause 38. He could not say, if the hon. and learned Member persisted with his Amendment, that it would not be in Order, but he would point out that in that case the subject could not be again gone into on the 38th clause.

MR. FIRTH said, he did not insist upon the discussion of his Amendment; but it seemed to him that as a matter of courtesy it should have been suggested to him either that he should move his Amendment, or that he would be out of Order in moving it, or that it would be more convenient for it to be postponed. In that case he would have withdrawn it, without a word.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT said, he had an Amendment in the same terms upon Clause 36; but he understood the Chairman to say that the subject was to be raised on Clause 38.

THE CHAIRMAN: That was a mistake, I meant Clause 36.

MR. WARMINGTON said, the next Amendment stood in his name, and was as follows:—Clause 2, page 2, line 5, at the end, to insert—

"(e.) No person shall be capable of being elected as a member of more than one County Council."

This Amendment was placed on the Paper before some decisions at which the Committee had arrived, and after those decisions it seemed to him that it would be better to move the Amendment in this form:—

"(e.) No person shall be capable of being a member of more than one County Council."

He would move the Amendment in that form. It had been now decided by the Committee that it was not necessary in order to qualify a person for a seat on a County Council that he should be a resident within the county. He might not be a resident within the county at all. If he had what was called the property qualification, he might be elected as a member of the Council. They knew perfectly well that there were many right hon. and hon. Gentlemen and others who had property and were rated in many counties, and he submitted that it would not be well for the good working of the Council itself that a member of one Council should also be a member of another. The County Council would be an important assembly, and each Council ought to have an important individual and separate influence, and it would detract from that power and influence of the Council if one of its members was a member of another Council. As those persons who were likely to be members of both would have considerable property, he ventured to suggest that it was desirable that each Council should be self-contained, and not number amongst its ranks those who were members of other Councils. It seemed to him that a Council would lose force if it possessed a member in common with another County Council, and that it would give to individuals an influence which they ought not to possess.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 2, after line 5, to insert the words, No person shall be capable of being a member of more than one County Council."— (Mr. Warmington).

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG) (Wilts, Devizes) said, that some of the Amendments on the Paper seemed to show that fear of the people which hon. Members opposite declared the Government showed. Above all things that which could be and might well be entrusted to the electors was the choice of the men who, in their opinion, ought to be elected, and it should be left to them to decide whether they should elect as Members of their own Council gentlemen who were qualified, though they might be members of adjoining Councils. Those who were engaged in County Business knew very well that gentlemen living on the boundaries of two counties were most valuable members of Quarter Sessions. Such gentlemen were frequently of the greatest assistance in the administration of the affairs of the two counties. He submitted that that was a point which should be left to the Councils themselves. There was no reason to think that the work of the Councils would be imperfectly done through the clause remaining as it stood, or that any inconvenience would arise to the ratepayers. The Government, therefore, would be obliged to resist this Amendment.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he did not think it would be well to trouble the Committee with any remarks upon the Amendment in the present state of the House. It would be more pertinent, perhaps, to call the Chairman's attention to the fact that there were not 40 Members present.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said, he presumed the present Amendment would meet with the same fate as other Amendments from that (the Opposition) side of the House. He thought the Government might, however, accept the Amendment, seeing that they had rejected the very reasonable proposal made just now as to the payment of the travelling expenses of the County Councillors. By the rejection of that proposal, the choice of the electors had been very much restricted, and the chances of persons possessed of property being elected on the County Councils had been greatly increased. They were entitled to ask that this clause should receive some consideration from the Government, seeing that they (the Government) had admitted the property qualification. It was quite possible that a Councillor under the circumstances, might be a candidate for one county under a property qualification, and might seek election upon another Council because he happened to be a resident in the county. It was a very wholesome and very wise and very useful proposal that was made by the hon. Member, and he sincerely hoped that the Government would give it their serious consideration.

[Fifth Night.]

Question put.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley) said, he wished to propose the Amendment on the Paper, No. 70—that was to say, in page 2, after line 7, to insert—“(a) Every borough shall return at least one Councillor.” He would appeal to the Government to constitute every municipal borough a separate electoral area, for the purpose of returning a Councillor. Within the last few hours they had been furnished with a proposal as to the number of Councillors the Government proposed should permanently form the County Council, and according to that, in the main, the suggestion he made in this Amendment was conceded. There were some exceptions, however, which would be made, and they would be in the case of small but ancient boroughs. He hoped that, inasmuch as this Paper which had been circulated was not considered the final decision of the Government, the appeal he now made would be favourably considered, and that a consequential Amendment a few lines further on would be also conceded. He begged to move the Amendment in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, after line 7, to insert the words, “(a) Every borough shall return at least one councillor.”—(Mr. Woodall.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. LONG said, he need hardly assure the Committee that the Government fully understood and appreciated the reasons which the hon. Member had adduced for proposing this Amendment—namely, that some of these boroughs were very ancient boroughs, and had for a very long time so successfully exercised their rights and privileges that they deserved separate representation. He might point out that the Amendment would not fall within the lines of the Bill. If it were adopted, the result would be that every town, which was a municipal borough, whether ancient or not, and no matter how small its population, would be entitled to have separate representation, whereas those large urban sanitary districts of great importance and with enormous populations, which did not happen to be boroughs, would be left to the Quarter Sessions. He had not the least doubt that the representation accorded to the boroughs would be fair and sufficient, but it had been thought by the Government that those of them which had not a sufficient population to entitle them to special representation should be left to the Quarter Sessions. He would remind the Committee that the subject was not a very important one, and did not necessarily involve a very large issue. There were only 30 boroughs in England and Wales which would be affected by the Amendment, and their populations varied very much, some of them falling as low as 900. When it was laid down that the representation on a County Council should only be one in 5,000, 6,000, 7,000, 8,000, or 10,000 it hardly seemed in accordance with the principles of the Bill that a borough having a population of only 900 or 1,000 should possess a representative. A place with a small population should not receive a privilege merely because it was ancient, whilst a new place with a large population was denied it. Those were the reasons why the Government could not accept the Amendment, and, in stating them, he had no wish to condemn the views of the hon. Gentleman who had brought forward the proposal, nor to say anything derogatory to the position of the small boroughs. The Government must adhere to the clause as it stood, and, if necessary, must divide the Committee against the Amendment.

MR. WOODALL said, he did not propose to press the Amendment to a Division, and, notwithstanding what had fallen from the hon. Member, who had just spoken, he still hoped that there would be some concession made—at any rate with regard to some of those boroughs which were not at present provided for. He urged that because the boroughs in question were important and useful for many purposes—for registration for instance, and for rating. They would continue to have separate existence, for it was not proposed to interfere with their rights to self-government and with the privileges they had enjoyed for centuries. He ventured most respectfully to urge that it would considerably improve the prospect of the successful working of the Bill, if the Government accepted his Amendment, and the boroughs were allowed to be, so far as separate representation on the Councils was concerned, separate areas instead of being merged in large districts.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) said, he should like to point out to the Mover of the Amendment and to the Government that there were a few populous places of the magnitude of boroughs, which had been allowed under Improvement Acts to constitute themselves into Town Commissions, which would come under the same category as the boroughs for whom the hon. Member (Mr. Woodall) spoke. If there had been any prospect of the hon. Member being successful in getting his Amendment adopted, he (Mr. Halley Stewart) would have asked the Government to enlarge the scope of it, so as to include the towns under the Government of the Town Commissioners.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) said, he wished to point out that there were a considerable number of boroughs of under 2,000 population in counties where there were 400,000 or 500,000 inhabitants; and the result of carrying this Amendment would be, it seemed to him, either to increase unduly the number of Councillors, or to give over-representation to these small towns. The small limit which it was understood was to be fixed to the number of Councillors on a County Council could not be adhered to if the Amendment were adopted.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) said, he desired to move the following Amendment:—In page 2, line 18, after “determine,” insert—

“Provided that as far as possible the electoral division shall be a parish or township, or an aggregate of parishes or townships.”

The Amendment, if carried, would give power to the managers of the Quarter Sessions to cut the counties into electoral divisions. He imagined that these electoral divisions would, in the future, play a considerable part in Local Government. He should like to call the attention of the Government also to the Amendment next but one on the Paper, which was in these terms—

“Provided, that, subject to any modifications approved of by the Local Government Board, an electoral division of a county shall consist of a parish, or a part of a parish, or an aggregation of entire parishes, or an urban sanitary district or part thereof, or an aggregation of entire urban sanitary districts.”

He did not wish at all to re-open the question of the parish so far as the reform of the Vestry was concerned, the Committee having already decided that point; but he thought the Government, during the second reading debate, admitted that it would be well to make the electoral division units of the common wants and sympathies and conditions. Now, the difficulty of making the parish a unit was its inequality. In some parts it was very populous, in others it had only a few inhabitants; but he thought that if, by this Amendment, they gave an instruction to the magistrates, as far as possible, to keep to the boundaries of a parish, they would obtain not merely a system of grouping parishes by people who were very well acquainted with the circumstances of the county, but would lay the foundation of that great system so much desired, and gradually make the parish the electoral unit. To make the parish the electoral unit would be valuable when they came to deal with the question of valuation—of simplifying and consolidating the areas and authorities in the matter of valuation. He moved the Amendment which stood in his name in the strong hope that the Government would be able to accept it. If they would not accept it here, would they give an undertaking that they would agree to its introduction on a later clause?

THE CHAIRMAN said, this appeared to him to be a supplementary direction which would come in better on Clause 52.

MR. T. E. ELLIS said, he would move his Amendment merely to elicit some expression of opinion from the Government. It was important, he thought, that they should know definitely what were the principles on which the electoral divisions were to be fixed. It would have materially assisted the deliberations of the Committee if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had been able to give them a Paper showing the number of Councillors it was proposed to have on these Councils when they commenced their proceedings.

MR. RITCHIE said, he must point out the inconvenience of discussing a question of this character upon what was really a very general clause.

Clause 52 was strictly connected with this question, and he was sure the hon. Gentleman would excuse the Government for not entering into a discussion now, which would, when that clause was reached, have to be gone over again. He thought, when the time came, that he should be able to show the hon. Member that this Amendment was not so much at variance with the provisions of the Bill as he supposed.

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon) said, he thought it was rather a pity that the Government had not given them their views upon this subject, because, owing to the way in which the Bill was drawn, it would be difficult to discuss the question without having some notion of what the ideas of the Government were. In his opinion it would have been well if the Committee had had an announcement by the Government that this was a principle which they would keep in view, because he agreed that it would not be possible to make the parish the unit of any large district of administration, though they might be of consultation.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) said, he was not willing to postpone his Amendment until they had from the Government a more clear statement of the position they intended to take up with regard to this question. That he thought was necessary to the understanding of the case. He thought, besides, they should have some intimation that the Government agreed to the principle of the Amendment.

MR. RITCHIE said, he must protest against the idea that it was desirable or convenient to press the Government for their opinion with regard to the clause which had not yet been reached.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. A. J. WILLIAMS said, the first decision of the area of the county was left to the determination of the Court of Quarter Sessions, and he could not help thinking that there ought to be some appeal against the decision of that body. He should have much preferred to have seen in the Bill a provision that an operation of this very important kind should have been performed by a Special Commission. He ventured to suggest to the Government that a great deal of time and trouble would be saved if the same experienced and able men were appointed at once to do this business throughout the country who had so admirably performed their work in 1885 in settling the Parliamentary Divisions at the small cost of only £4,000. He desired to speak with all respect of his brother magistrates; but he suggested that work of this kind, in which a certain amount of political feeling would be involved, was not such as it was right to leave to bodies of gentlemen who were, by general admission throughout the country, naturally not without a distinct political bias in one direction. He had had experience in reference to redistribution in his own county, and he was bound to say that he should look with great concern on the present redistribution if it were to be conducted in the same way. He strongly urged on the Government that some Amendment should be introduced for the purpose of leaving this matter to Special Commissioners; and if the Government did not see their way to this, he should be compelled to move an Amendment for the purpose. Having put the case shortly and plainly to the Government, he sincerely trusted that they would accept his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 22, at end, insert—"Provided always, that every decision of justices at quarter sessions as to the electoral divisions in the county shall be by order, notice of which shall be published once at least in every newspaper published in the county. Such order shall be submitted for confirmation to the Local Government Board. If within one month after publication of such notice as aforesaid not less than twenty county electors petition the Local Government Board to disallow the order, the Local Government Board shall cause to be held a local inquiry and determine whether such order shall be confirmed or modified."—(Mr. A. J. Williams.)

MR. LONG said, the hon. Gentleman had put before the Committee two proposals, one of which was embodied in the Amendment he had just moved, and the other was that the same course should be pursued in the present instance as was followed in the case of the Parliamentary Electoral Division—namely, that of appointing Special Commissioners. While acknowledging, as he did most freely, the very moderate and fair way in which the hon. Gentleman had stated his case, he would point out why the Government could not accept the Amendment. The first objection to it was that, in order to constitute these electoral divisions, it would be necessary that three distinct stages should be gone through. It was the desire of the House and the Government that if this Bill passed, as they were confident it would during the present Session, it should come into operation early next year; but if the Amendment were agreed to, it would be impossible that the Bill should come into operation when it was hoped and expected to do, and, moreover, its operation would be postponed for another year. The Government could not, therefore, contemplate the admission of the Amendment proposed. The next proposal was that they should adopt the procedure in connection with the last Reform Bill, by appointing Commissioners to settle the divisions. He might, he believed, endorse the view expressed by the hon. Gentleman as to the work of the Commissioners, which he believed had been done in the best possible way; but he would point out that there was a great difference between the work which they performed and that which had to be done now in connection with this Bill. In the county which he had the honour to represent (Wiltshire), the Commissioners had to constitute only five Parliamentary Divisions, and with respect to them several meetings had to be held, at which objections were taken. But in order to bring the Act into operation in his county they would have to set up 50 or 60 electoral divisions for the purpose of County Council elections; and he suggested to the Committee that the appointment of Commissioners would so delay the Bill as to make it impossible for it to come into operation by the time which the Government desired. The hon. Gentleman also expressed a hope that there should be some appeal against the decision of the magistrates; but he pointed out that this was in the Bill as it stood; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) had stated that the provisions for the alteration and rectification of areas were as large and complete as they possibly could be. Not only were the powers for alteration and rectification of boroughs sufficient; but the hon. Member would find that the County Council was given sufficient power to enable it, if desirable, to make alterations which would constitute fair areas of election. For these reasons, the Government could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman or the alternative which he suggested.

MR. A. J. WILLIAMS said, he was aware of the power given to the County Councils. But when the work of constituting the areas was done the mischief was irretrievable. He was bound to say he had great distrust of the County Justices in this matter, and he felt the absolute necessity of taking some steps to prevent the consequences which he apprehended. He asked the right hon. Gentleman, at all events, to give the right of appeal to the Local Government Board. With regard to the time necessary for fixing the areas, he undertook to say that the work with regard to a district could be done in one day, and that of a whole county in two.

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not understand how the hon. Member could say that the mischief would be already done when the area was constituted by the Justices. The idea of the Government was to place in the hands of the County Councils full power over the area as far as it could possibly be done. It was essential that when a Bill of this character had passed, a long interval should not intervene before it came into operation, and they had not set up the machinery contemplated by the hon. Member, because it would undoubtedly take up a considerable amount of time; and he undertook to say further that if the Bill were not passed until the Session was well advanced, and if the plan were adopted, it could not come into operation in January as they proposed. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the practice of Quarter Sessions was inadequate to this matter. But that was not the case. There were distinct provisions in the Bill, in the way of precaution, with regard to the setting up of the electoral divisions; and it was not conceivable that gentlemen who would take so conspicuous a part in the new system would so neglect their duties, or discharge them in so partial a way, as to make the divisions which they constituted unfair to any part of the country, especially as they had clear instructions laid down as to the course they should pursue. Surely, therefore, they might be trusted to do what was right and fair in all the circumstances of the case. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board had pointed out that if there were any objections to a scheme it was in the power of the County Council to consider not only the area, but the number of Councillors; and if an alteration was necessary in the county or borough boundaries they must come to Parliament for a Provisional Order. The County Councils would practically have the matter entirely in their own hands, and the Government, therefore, could not recognize that there was any real foundation for the supposition that the magistrates of Quarter Sessions would not do what was right in this matter, or that if they did wrong there was not ample power in the Bill for that wrong to be set right.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye) said, he wished to point out that Quarter Sessions were by no means in favour at the present time with regard to the principle on which they arranged the polling districts, and that great cause of complaint had arisen. What they wanted was some clear and distinct guarantee that there should be power of appeal, which could be enforced before it was too late, from the decision at which the Quarter Sessions arrived. The right hon. Gentleman said there was appeal to the County Council. But he said that this, in the great majority of cases, could only come into operation when it was too late, because where the Quarter Sessions decided unfairly a certain number of members of the County Council would have been elected on the basis of the electoral divisions, and then the work of the Council would be performed by means of the system of County Aldermen, and by a system of co-optation. Therefore, he said there should be some means of immediate appeal against the decision of Quarter Sessions.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he regretted that he was not in his place when his name was called in reference to Amendment No. 80, because it was the alternative Amendment to which his hon. Friend (Mr. A. J. Williams) had referred. As the Amendment did not meet with the approbation of the Government, he would suggest a compromise that might with advantage be placed before the Committee as another Amendment. However much hon. Gentlemen opposite might think that the people in the counties placed implicit confidence in Quarter Sessions in a matter of this kind, he would only say that their experience did not coincide with his own. There was the gravest distrust of that body in these matters. But they wished to make no charges against Quarter Sessions; they merely said there was a feeling that this important matter of redistribution ought not to be left in the hands of gentlemen who practically represented only one class, and in whose ultimate decision great numbers of the people, at any rate, had not that implicit reliance which was desirable. They desired to give a good start to the County Councils, to see them started with the confidence of all parties, and they were very far from admitting that this would be the case if these very important arrangements of boundaries was not effected in such a manner as would command the confidence of the whole of the people of the country. If delay were so necessary to be avoided, he did not think it would be difficult to adopt the suggestion that the magistrates should hold a special sessions for the purpose of this business of settling the electoral divisions, and that at such special sessions the ratepayers should be entitled to be represented, in order to place their views before the magistrates, before whom, under the present system, they were not represented. It would be remembered that in the case of the redistribution of seats the ratepayers were entitled to appear before the Commissioners, and express their views with respect to the boundaries. He accepted the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman that there would not be time for the Commissioners to be sent down to do this business, and also that it would cause too much delay if appeal were to lie to the Local Government Board; but he thought it would be found to be necessary for the magistrates to hold a special sessions for the purpose in view, because in the ordinary course of things no sessions could be held until rather late in the autumn at which this business could be dealt with. If it were desirable that such special sessions should be held, he thought it would be only fair that the ratepayers should be represented at them, in order that the authority might be in possession of their views.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, he thought that after an examination of Clause 52 the Committee would be of opinion that the discussion at this stage of the Bill was somewhat premature,

He should be out of Order if he were to refer in detail to the provisions of that clause; but hon. Members who would refer to it would find that instructions were given in that clause of a character which defined the nature of the boundaries. It seemed to him that in case the Committee, when they reached that clause, thought the instructions there given were too vague, or left in an unfair manner room for the attainment of Party objects, they could make the instructions more clear, definite, and precise. He could not shut out from his mind what took place on the passing of the last Reform Act. At that time the creation of the new polling districts was left by the Liberal Government in the hands of the magistrates. He had the honour of being a member of the Bench of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and, although on the Bench there was a majority of Conservatives, the greatest care was taken that on the different sub-committees, to whom the making of the alteration of the polling districts was delegated, each of the two Parties should be equally represented, and he was sure the greatest pains were taken by those who served on those committees that every elector should have the best opportunity of coming to the poll. So far as he knew, there had not been one complaint of injustice or unfairness in respect to the arrangement of the polling districts in that great Division, the West Riding of Yorkshire. He felt the force of the argument founded on the shortness of time which had been raised, and he believed it to be entirely fatal to the proposition. He knew that in the year after the passing of the last Reform Act it was only by the most severe pressure that the machinery was set going in time for the General Election; and, warned by that experience, he must respectfully suggest to the Committee the expediency of now constructing such machinery that there would be no difficulty or delay. Hon. Members opposite very often talked about economy; but it was impossible that the Inspectors of the Local Government Board could visit the country without being a new cause of expense. The summary of his remarks was that this discussion was premature, that it would be better to deal with the subject when they came to Clause 52, and would be called upon to consider what safeguards ought to be provided in favour of equal justice to all sections of the people.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) said, he did not want to dogmatize as to what might be the best method of accomplishing their desire; but he put it to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board whether it was not possible for him to reconsider his decision, and to find a way for them out of the difficulty? Now, he did not agree that the proposal in the Bill would be satisfactory; that was his first proposition. He expected that there would be a natural—whether just or unjust he would not say—but a natural dissatisfaction in the counties at the probable and actual decision of the magistrates. In boroughs the existing authority would have the settling of the polling districts; but in counties the County Councils could not have that, because they were not as yet formed. His argument was that it was not probable that the public, as a whole, would be entirely satisfied with the decisions of the Quarter Sessions; and that it was desirable that there should be an appeal against the decision of the Quarter Sessions, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman might find a way of giving such an appeal. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to have the work done in time. He (Mr. Stansfeld) was not quite sure about that. The magistrates might be directed to set about the work at an early date, so that there would be time to hear any appeal. The right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that the officers of the Local Government Board were able men, and men who, upon the whole, the public trusted. It seemed to him that it was not advisable—he should think it was not necessary—if the right hon. Gentleman would give his attention to the subject, to expect and call upon the public to be satisfied with the decision without any appeal. He confined himself now to suggesting to the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not give them some hope that they might devise a plan which would give an appeal. He could not think that that was impossible. Of course, it was most likely that the number of appeals would be very limited.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was very much afraid that if the right hon. Gentleman, whose experience was infinitely greater than anything he could lay claim to, had been unable to suggest what the nature of the change which was desired should be, he could not hold out very much hope that he would be able to devise a method by which the desires of hon. Gentlemen would be satisfied. He could not but think that Quarter Sessions could be trusted, even by those who had some mistrust of them, especially in view of the provisions of Clause 52 to do something which was not, at any rate, conspicuously unfair. He could not imagine that the scheme of the Quarter Sessions would be of such a nature that the County Council, when constituted, would not be a fitting judge of it. The whole basis of the Government proposal was that the County Council should be the judge; that they should be able to put right that which was wrong. He was afraid he could not invent a method which would be more satisfactory than that they proposed. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested that the Quarter Sessions should be pressed to take action early. But they could not commence the work until the Bill was passed, and the right hon. Gentleman knew that between August and September and the election in November there was very little time in which to arrange the polling districts. He was afraid he could not hope to propose a better plan than that, first of all, those gentlemen who were accustomed to county work should, under the directions of the Bill, set out the electoral divisions, and that afterwards the County Councils should have full power to reconsider the electoral divisions so as to amend them if necessary.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe) said, he thought the President of the Local Government Board had not correctly understood the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld). His right hon. Friend did not at all object to the County Councils having, eventually, to deal with this matter. So far, they were perfectly satisfied with the proposals in the Bill. But what they wished to urge upon the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill was that it could not be expected that the public would be entirely satisfied with the Quarter Sessions as the authority for settling the boundaries, unless an appeal was given. What they asked for was a very simple thing. He quite admitted there were very clear directions laid down in Clause 52; that they would bind the Quarter Sessions to a considerable extent; and that Quarter Sessions would have to keep within those directions in the consideration of the electoral districts. But there would be very much greater confidence felt if there was a power of appeal. Probably, as Clause 52 set out so many directions, the appeal would only be exercised in a very few instances. The great safeguard would be in the power of appeal. With respect to boroughs, the right hon. Gentleman was able to give satisfaction to the Committee, because he had an authority already constituted; but if hon. Gentlemen looked at the last subsection of Clause 52, they would find, as regarded London, that the Local Government Board would constitute the authority for settling, in the first instance, the electoral divisions. Let him point out that in the Municipal Corporations Act, the guidance of which the right hon. Gentleman proposed in most respects to follow, it was provided that when a borough was established, or when the boundaries of wards had to be settled, a Commissioner nominated by the Home Secretary should be sent down to fix the boundaries. There might be difficulty in following that exact precedent in this case; but if the right hon. Gentleman followed that precedent, he (Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth) and his hon. Friends would be perfectly satisfied. They did not object at all as to the future; what they complained of were the arrangements for the election of the first County Council. The President of the Local Government Board would save a good deal of time in the discussion of this particular part of the Bill if he would at once concede that which seemed a perfectly reasonable demand—namely, that in the settlement of the polling districts there should be a right of appeal from the Quarter Sessions to the Local Government Board.

MR. WHARTON said, he must protest against the idea that there should be any unfairness on the part of the Quarter Sessions. The Quarter Sessions had settled the polling districts for the County of Durham, and there had never been uttered one word of complaint. That Quarter Sessions were actuated by Party motives in such matters was a suggestion he strongly repudiated.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had rested his argument very largely on the directions given in Clause 52; but he (Mr. Channing) desired to remind the Committee that the directions in Clause 22, except as regards the boundaries of sanitary areas, were more arithmetical. The clause did not contain any directions to the Quarter Sessions of the same character as the directions given to the Commissioners who had to settle the electoral divisions under the Redistribution of Seats Act. One of the directions under that Act was that the Commissioners should arrange the districts so that they should include a population of one type and common general interests and character, whereas Clause 52 simply directed the Quarter Sessions to adopt, as far as possible, electoral districts equal in population. Practically the hands of the magistrates were left absolutely unfettered; they could draw the lines wherever they chose. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Ripon Division (Mr. Wharton) said he never heard the action of the Quarter Sessions challenged. In the county he (Mr. Channing) had the honour to represent he had heard too many complaints of the action of the Quarter Sessions with regard to the arrangements of the polling districts in 1885 to acquiesce in that statement. In placing this power in the hands of the Quarter Sessions, the Government were placing a temptation in the hands of gentlemen, who, individually and as a class, were specially interested, to arrange the polling districts so as to obtain a majority favourable to their views at the first County Council. [Cries of "No, no!"] He should be very glad to hear the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite to the contrary. He thought that either by granting the right of appeal, or by setting out in Clause 52 more definite directions, the Government would do much to secure confidence in the impartiality of the arrangement of the electoral districts.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland) said, he could not help thinking that the opinions of some of his hon. Friends on the Opposition Benches were very much exaggerated. He entirely agreed with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Wharton) as to the county of Durham. Durham was an intensely Radical county. It was a county, nevertheless, where a great majority of the magistrates were Conservatives—in fact, he did not know a place in England of which that was not true since the present Lord Chancellor came into power. But, notwithstanding this fact, the people of Durham had no reason to complain, and he did not believe they would have under the arrangement the Government now suggested. He was afraid when the last Reform Bill was under discussion that they would have some reason to complain; but after the experience they had had he was quite content. He knew it would be urged that their Commissioners were appointed. That was true. And it was said that now the arrangement of the polling districts rested with the Quarter Sessions. But what he particularly wanted to point out to the Liberals sitting near him was that the Quarter Sessions were closely bound up and regulated in the matter. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell) referred to Clause 52. He could not think that the right hon. Gentleman who had spoken from the Front Opposition Bench had considered Clause 52 very carefully. He could not discuss the clause at this stage of the proceedings; but he might, perhaps, be allowed to state what were the regulations or conditions under which the Quarter Sessions must act. He found it was proposed that the first condition should be that the Quarter Sessions should arrange the divisions according to the population. More than that, he found that they must have regard to every present urban sanitary district and every rural sanitary district—that they must form their electoral divisions either by making one of these districts a division, if it were big enough, or by combining two or more if they were small, but it must not, and it should not, divide any one of these districts so as to jerrymander the constituency. Under these circumstances he said freely that there was no Quarter Sessions in the country he would not trust. He begged to suggest to his less Radical Friends that they should not get exaggerated fears on the point, but trust to Providence in the matter. Well, let him tell the Committee what happened in the County of Durham after the Reform Bill was passed. He did not—a great many people did not—care what electoral divisions were made—they felt perfectly comfortable. They got eight divisions, and they felt perfectly sure that as long as the sun shone they would be able to send eight Radicals to Parliament. What happened? At the very first election two Liberal Unionists were returned. After that he came to the conclusion that it did not much matter what the Quarter Sessions or any body should arrange as to the polling districts. The opinions of a district were continually changing. There was nobody, not even the cleverest man amongst them, who would venture to foretell what would be the issue in the different counties. County matters would not be settled by considerations of Radicalism or Toryism. A great many other considerations would enter into the settlement. There would be plenty of opportunities of discussing all sorts of questions on this Bill, and, therefore, he suggested to his hon. Friends that this particular point might very safely be left to the Quarter Sessions.

MR. STANSFELD said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) had challenged him to devise a method by which it might be possible to do what they wished in the time which was permitted to them. In consequence of that challenge he would make a suggestion, and it was that Sub-section (c) should read in this way—

“In the rest of the county the electoral divisions shall be such as in the case of a borough returning more than one councillor the council of the borough, and in the rest of the county the quarter sessions for the county, with the approval of the Local Government Board, may determine.”

All that would be necessary in that case would be that there should be a sufficient margin of time for the Local Government Board, using their own ample machinery, to revise, in the interests of the public, the determinations or the decisions of the Quarter Sessions of the various counties. He could not see that it would be impossible for the Local Government Board officials to perform their functions in the necessary time. He did not doubt the Quarter Sessions' impartiality, but he maintained that it was not advisable, under the circumstances, to put the Quarter Sessions in the position of having to act a judicial part which some persons might think they performed with partiality. It must be borne in mind that the Quarter Sessions were the body who were going to be disestablished and displaced by the new County Councils, and it was not likely they would be considered by the public necessarily impartial in a matter of this kind. Why not save them from any possible imputation in the matter, which they could easily do by the insertion of the words “with the approval of the Local Government Board?”

MR. RITCHIE said, the right hon. Gentleman knew well enough the multiplicity of duties which were at present placed on the shoulders of the Local Government Board; he knew perfectly well that the staff at the command of the Local Government Board was certainly not greater than was required to do the work. What the right hon. Gentleman proposed must mean either something or nothing. If it meant that, as a matter of course, the Local Government Board were to give their approval, it meant nothing. If it meant that they were to ascertain through their Inspectors, or by means of local inquiries, that the proposals for dividing the county into electoral districts were right and just as between one party and another, it meant more than the Local Government Board could possibly undertake. Therefore, he was very much afraid that the solution which the right hon. Gentleman proposed was one which would not get rid of the difficulty. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) had paid valuable testimony to the services which had hitherto been rendered by the Justices, and to the confidence which might be placed in their proper performance of the duties cast upon them by this clause. He (Mr. Ritchie) could hardly think that anyone who had studied Clause 52 could have the smallest fear either that Quarter Sessions would not do their duty, or that the way in which they did it would render them open to the slightest suspicion.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said, the whole object of the Bill, as he understood it, was to take county government out of the hands of Quarter Sessions, and put it in the hands of the people. That was the broad democratic view Her Majesty's Government expressed, and yet one of their first operations in Committee was to give to the Quarter Sessions the duty of arranging the electoral districts, and to provide that there should be no right of appeal. In the constituency which he had the honour to represent, the Quarter Sessions had arranged, in their wisdom, polling places which had given universal dissatisfaction. [Cries of "No, no!"] He was speaking of his own district. Hon. Gentlemen said "No, no!" but they knew nothing about the matter. He was sure he should be borne out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler), who did know something about the subject, when he said the arrangement of the polling districts was a most crying evil. His (Sir John Swinburne's) constituents had made representations upon the subject, but all to no purpose. What happened in 1885 would happen in this case. And yet Her Majesty's Government refused them the slightest appeal, even to the Local Government Board. He sincerely hoped the Government would reconsider their decision. He could not add anything to what had been said by hon. Members sitting around him, except that it was very illogical that when they were taking the government of counties out of the hands of the Quarter Sessions they should give power to Quarter Sessions and allow no appeal.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester) said, he would not stand more than a minute or two between the Committee and a Division. He only wished to say how cordially he agreed with the remarks made by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey). Gloucestershire Liberals could trust the Gloucestershire Quarter Sessions. The Quarter Sessions were not a body, in his county, who would do the shabby things suggested; and it would not pay them to do such things if they could do them. Even if a Quarter Sessions acted on Party lines, and put all the blue districts together and all the yellow districts together, they would fail to effect their object. He believed the Quarter Sessions could be trusted to do this work fairly. Personally, he would rather leave it to the Quarter Sessions than to the Local Government Board, which, of course, must be governed by the political Chiefs for the time being.

MR. H. T. DAVENPORT (Staffordshire, Leek) said, he merely rose in consequence of the observations of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Swinburne). He had the honour to represent a Division of Staffordshire, and he had also the honour of being a member of the Quarter Sessions. He was a member of the committee appointed to arrange the polling districts throughout Staffordshire under the Redistribution of Seats Act, and he asserted most distinctly that if there had been any complaint in any part of the county as to the unsuitability of the electoral arrangements he should have heard of it. He had never heard of any sort of complaint. He, therefore, protested most emphatically against the imputation the hon. Baronet had cast upon the Quarter Sessions of which he was a member.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE said, that in support of his original statement he had only to say that hundreds of men—miners—had at the last election to walk four miles in a pouring rain before they could record their votes.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 178; Noes 256: Majority 78.—(Div. List, No. 151.)

MR. CONYBEARE said, he had to propose the addition of the words—

"Provided that quarter sessions shall meet for such purposes in special session, at which any ratepayer shall be entitled to be heard."

He assured the Committee he did not move this Amendment in any hostile sense. He was not desirous of making any charge against the magistrates, either in his own county or in other counties; but there was a feeling, certainly in Cornwall, that the ratepayers should have something to say in this important matter, and he thought it was only fair that they should have the right to represent their views at the Sessions at which the matter was to be settled. The President of the Local Government Board would not deny it would be necessary that a special session of the Quarter Sessions should be held for the purpose of fixing the boundaries; and all he (Mr. Conybeare) asked was that the ratepayers should be entitled to make their views known to the magistrates on this subject, just as they were entitled to be heard, and just as they were heard, by the Commission who fixed the electoral divisions under the Redistribution of Seats Act.

[Fifth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

 "Provided that quarter sessions shall meet for such purpose in special session at which any ratepayer shall be entitled to be heard."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

MR. RITCHIE said, he thought the Quarter Sessions could be trusted to take right and proper steps for fulfilling the duty cast upon them under this clause without minute and special instructions such as the hon. Gentleman wished to give. Quarter Sessions had long been in the habit of exercising most important functions in their various counties, and everybody acknowledged that this Bill was not necessitated by any failure on their part to perform their duty adequately and well. To give the magistrates such minute instructions as that now proposed would be to cast an unnecessary slur upon them.

MR. CONYBEARE said, the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood him. He did not propose any instruction whatever; he merely asked that the ratepayers, who were certainly concerned in the matter just as much as the Quarter Sessions, should be entitled to represent their views as to the different points which might arise in the discussion of what was evidently in some respects a delicate matter.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) said, he desired to propose an Amendment adapting the single transferable vote to the case of single-member elections, where no candidate received a clear majority of the votes given. In almost every country where the single-member system was in operation, it had been found necessary to adopt a system of second ballot. At a recent German General Election there were second elections in some 25 per cent. of the constituencies. In our rural elections it was likely that in many cases more than two candidates would stand. The plan proposed would obviate the expense of a second election by practically taking the two together. Suppose, for instance, three candidates were standing. The elector would be allowed to indicate the order of his preference by marking the candidates respectively 1 and 2.

Suppose that out of 1,000 electors 400 voted for A, 350 for B, and 250 for C. Then C would be declared not elected, and his votes would be distributed between A and B, as indicated by the electors. In that manner they would secure that the representative returned was really the choice of a majority of the electors. His (Sir John Lubbock's) Friends with whom he acted regarded this as a matter of much importance, and hoped it would receive the attention of the Government. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board did not see his way to accept the suggestion, he (Sir John Lubbock) would not press it to a Division; but he hoped the Government would consider it before Report.

MR. RITCHIE said, he hoped the hon. Baronet would not press the Amendment. They had already had a discussion upon proportional representation, and this Amendment was somewhat akin to that subject. Of course, everything the hon. Baronet said merited consideration, but he (Mr. Ritchie) was afraid he could hold out but very faint hope of the Government adopting the present Amendment.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, the right hon. Gentleman had evidently not considered the Amendment which had nothing whatever to do with proportional representation; its object was simply that no one should be elected who did not receive a majority of the votes. He would not, however, press the Amendment against the wish of the Government.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE said, the object of the Amendment he had now to propose was that the Chairman of the Council should always be one of the elected Councillors. It would be seen that if the Chairman was not one of the elected Councillors he might not be in accord with the majority of the time.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 30, insert—" (a) He shall be one of the elected councillors."—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, that as the Committee had adopted the proposal in the Bill in reference to the aldermanic element it would be casting a very unnecessary slur upon the Aldermen if they were to say that none of them should be the Chairman of the Council. It would be strictly unfair to say that a selected Councillor should not be able to rise to the highest position in the Council.

Question put.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, that when he put down the Amendment standing in his name on the Paper which would provide for enlarging the term of office of the Chairman of the County Council from three years to six, he had put another down dealing with the form in which the Council was to be elected; and as the Committee had rejected a similar Amendment moved by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), he did not think it would be advisable to enter into the question of the duration of the Chairman's term of office until they knew what the Government intended to do in regard to the decision arrived at on Monday night. He did not propose, therefore, to move his Amendment.

MR. CONYBEARE said, the next Amendment which was in his name was in principle directed to the same point as the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had just declined to move. His (Mr. Conybeare's) proposal was that the Chairman of the County Council should hold office not for three years but for one year, and should be eligible for re-election. This proposal was a very simple one, and he thought they were entitled to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, who was constantly quoting to them the Municipal Corporations Act, why he had not, in the case of the duration of the term of office of the Chairman of the County Council, followed the rule laid down in that Act with regard to the Chairman of a Municipal Council? The Chairmen of Borough Councils were elected for one year, and he had never heard that the system had worked badly. He had frequently heard of Mayors who had properly fulfilled their duties being re-elected. He could quote many cases in Cornwall where they had been re-elected after having satisfactorily gone through their first term of office. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board could have no good reason for departing from the model he had chosen to follow in the whole of this Bill. If he did not adopt the principle of this or some similar Amendment, it would appear that the right hon. Gentleman had some hidden motive for not adhering to the popular term which hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House were disposed to advocate.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 31, to leave out the words "three years," and insert "one year, but he should be eligible for re-election."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

MR. RITCHIE said, he was much obliged to the hon. Gentleman opposite for asking the question he had done, as to why he (Mr. Ritchie) had not followed the precedent of the Municipal Corporations Act, and he trusted the explanation he would give would be satisfactory. He desired to explain that under the Municipal Corporations Act each electoral division had three members, and one of those retired each year. There was thus an infusion of one-third of the whole electoral body into the Council every year, which materially altered the constitution of the Council; and the reason why, under the Municipal Corporations Act, a Mayor retained office for only one year was to give an opportunity to the new members who had lately joined the Council to record their votes in the choice of a Chairman. As the hon. Member would see, the reason they had adopted the term of three years in the present Bill was that it had been so far decided by the Committee that the whole body of the Councillors should retire every three years. The analogy, so far as that point was concerned, between the present Bill and the Municipal Corporations Act was not complete.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, it seemed to him that the reason given by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for departing from the principle of the Municipal Corporations Act was a very unsatisfactory one. He desired to get a better reason from the right hon. Gentleman than that which he had given. The one-year system had been tried in England; but in Scotland, where they managed these things much better, they had adopted the three-years' system. That plan gave great satisfaction; it afforded greater stability to their Municipal Institutions; and under it they were not so much in the hands of Town Clerks and local officials. The Provost at the head of a Scotch Municipality was more independent than an English Mayor, who, being elected annually, fell more into the hands of the permanent officials.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, he did not think the boroughs of England would be likely to favour the idea of departing from the time-honoured system of annually electing their Mayor, and he must express his astonishment that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had not followed the precedent of the Municipal Corporations Act in the present Bill. He (Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth) desired to call attention to this point—that it was now the practice of that Body which governed our county affairs to elect its Chairman every year. The Annual Session of the County of Lancaster elected its Chairman every year. It was true that the Annual Session had chosen the same Chairman for many years, and if annual elections were adopted in the case of the Chairmen of County Councils no doubt the same practice would prevail. The right hon. Gentleman, in his reply just now, had assumed that the arrangement of the Bill would result in the County Councils remaining intact for three years, when there would be a change in them. He (Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth) thought, however, from what was proposed the other night by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, they were to understand that that subject was to be reconsidered by the Government. He thought some hope was held out that a third of the Council would have to be re-elected every two years. If that were so, it would point to the Chairman holding office for a less period than three years. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to follow the precedent of the elections in connection with the Annual Session of Lancaster.

MR. RITCHIE said, he quite understood that his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury gave an undertaking that the Government would reconsider the term for which the County Councillors were to be elected; and, of course, if that point were reconsidered, and an alteration were made in that part of the Bill, he recognized that it was right and fitting that some proposal should also be made with reference to the term of office of the Chairman; but until the three years' term of office for Councillors was altered he thought it would be better to adhere to the proposal in the Bill.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment for the moment on a distinct understanding being come to on this point. He quite understood what had been pointed out by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth)—namely, that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had practically promised to reconsider the question as to the position of the County Aldermen, and had expressed himself in favour of the view that there should be Councils elected for a period of six years, a third retiring by rotation every two years. He mentioned that merely to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board what appeared to him very clear—namely, that if they retained the provision for a three-years' term of office by the Chairman, it would not square with the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury appeared to be prepared to recommend. He should like to ask whether the Government would place their final proposal before the Committee before they concluded Section 2, as he was not at all clear that it would be advisable to wait for the Report stage on the whole Bill, because, according to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, it would be a long time before they arrived at that stage. If the Government would promise to bring up their proposals as to the Councils generally, which would involve the determination of the question of the Chairman's term of office, before the Question was put that Clause 2 stand part of the Bill, he would not press his Amendment to a Division. However, unless the Government were prepared to give the Committee an opportunity of considering and settling this important point, he should feel it his duty, if he met with any support on that (the Opposition) side of the House, to take a Division.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, it would be in the recollection of the Committee that what he had undertaken was to reconsider the question referred to between the Committee stage and the Report stage of the Bill, and to make a statement to the House on Report. He could not undertake to do more than that.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, he could not see that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Oenyebeare) was at all bound up with the tenure of office of the elective Councillors. If a Council which was elected for three years had to elect its Chairman for one year, the same Council could re-elect a Chairman if it thought him a suitable man. It seemed to him that it would be a more sensible plan that they should have the Chairman elected for one year, and eligible for re-election if he desired it. They would have entirely new Councils brought together, and largely composed of new men unaccustomed to work together, and there would be a great difficulty in finding out who was the best man for Chairman when they met. It would be a pity that they should be saddled for any length of time with an unsuitable man; therefore, the term of office should not be a long one. Of course, as he had pointed out, if the Chairman elected for a year was found to be suitable, he could be re-elected as often as it was thought desirable. He hoped the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Camborne Division would persist in his Amendment and divide the Committee upon it, not only because the question of the length of the term of office of the Councillors was to be deferred for a long time—a fact which he was very sorry for—but also because he could not see that the two questions were in any way bound up with one another.

MR. STANSFELD said, he would put it to the right hon. Gentleman the

First Lord of the Treasury whether it would not be more convenient to the Committee, and quite as convenient for the Government, if he made his statement when they came to Clause 36, which dealt with the application of the Act to the Metropolis as County of London?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he certainly would endeavour to give the Committee the earliest information on the matter, but he only reminded the Committee of what was the understanding arrived at a few days ago, and he thought it always desirable that Parliamentary understandings should literally be adhered to.

MR. HALLEY STEWART said, the objection to frequent elections in the case of Councillors was that it would lead to great expense; but that objection could not apply to the election of a Chairman. He would put it to the Government that having established, in the first place, that the election of Councillors should not be frequent on the ground of expense, it was inconsequent to insist that the Committee had come to a conclusion on this point, which was an entirely different matter.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) said, that the original proposal was that the life of the Council should be three years, and that that period should be the tenure of office of the Chairman, and he trusted the Government would not yield to pressure, but would stick to that.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, as there was some doubt as to the Scotch example, he desired to say that the Committee should consider that the County Councils were not only to be deliberative Bodies, but Bodies to replace the present deliberative Bodies of the counties. Well, it was impossible that they should have an efficient administrative functionary if they were continually chopping and changing. To have an efficient administrator at the head of their county they must have a man who had some chance of showing his administrative powers. He hoped the Government would very seriously consider this matter before they yielded to pressure.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) said, he had some hesitation in addressing the Committee after the very modest speech they had just heard from the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy as to the value of the example he had placed before them. The hon. Member did not seem to be aware of the fact that they had a custom in England, when a gentleman was elected to a responsible position, and gained the confidence of his fellows in that position, to re-elect him on the expiration of his term of office. But, by making the election an annual one, instead of having it every three years, it had given those on whom rested the duty of making the choice an opportunity of getting rid of a man who, instead of being capable of the discharge of the functions of his office, proved himself what was commonly called a bore. Annual elections enabled electors to get rid of persons they did not care for, and to try the experiment of putting other men in their places who might be more capable than those they succeeded. He thought this was one of those instances in which the Government had departed from their model—the Municipal Corporations Act—in a manner which they were not to be congratulated upon. It seemed to him that they were most unfortunate when they swerved from the principles of the Municipal Corporations Act, because such a departure was always in the direction pointed out by Conservative policy.

MR. HENEAGE said, he hoped the Government would stick to the term in the Bill, and leave the whole question open to be decided when the Committee knew what the view of the Government was as to the term of office of the County Councillors.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston) said, that the Chairmanship of School Boards was a good example to justify the proposal of a three years' tenure of office by the Chairman of a County Council. But, supposing the term of office in the Bill for County Councillors was altered to six years, a third of them retiring every two years, he should strongly object to the Chairman being elected for six years. However, when they came to discuss the question as to whether the Councillors should be elected for three years or six years, they would be able to decide the question of the term of office of the Chairman with fuller information. If some understanding as to the course to be adopted was not come to by the Government he should not be able to vote with them.

Mr. J. Rowlands

MR. RITCHIE said, that when the proposal in regard to County Councils came up, whether the proposal were adopted or not, that would be the time for the Committee to consider whether the three years' term of office in the case of Chairmen should remain or not. The Government were strongly in favour of the three years' term. They thought that good would be done by adopting the proposal as it stood in the Bill in giving stability. There would be greater stability given to a presiding officer by allowing him to hold office for three years than in making the term simply one year.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) said, he wished to point out that Boards of Guardians and Local Boards of Health appointed their Chairman once a-year. He had the honour to be a member of a Local Board, whose deliberations were presided over by a Chairman who had held office for 16 years; but then he was re-elected annually. It seemed to him that it would be a greater honour to a Chairman to be elected annually than to be appointed for a number of years.

MR. HALLEY STEWART said, that where they would only be able to get one man who would serve as Chairman for three years they would be able to get 10 to serve for one year. The difficulty would be to get men of honour and ability, and with spare cash at their command, who would take the responsible position of a Chairman of a County Council, and he was confident the Committee would be limiting the choice of the Councillors by making the term of office three years.

Question put.

MR. HENEAGE said, he begged to propose Amendment No. 103, standing in his name, which was as follows:—In page 2, line 31, after "and," insert "he shall by virtue of his office be a justice of the peace for the county."

MR. RITCHIE: Agreed, agreed!

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 31, after the word "and," insert the words "he shall by virtue of his office be a justice of the peace for the county."—(Mr. Heneage.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. RITCHIE said, he begged to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), to leave out the following paragraph:— "(c) He must be qualified to be a justice of the peace for the county; and."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 32, leave out paragraph (c). — (Mr. Ritchie.)

MR. CONYBEARE said, he begged to move Amendment No. 116 standing in his name.

MR. HENEAGE rose to Order. He desired to move to leave out paragraph (d.), which was as follows:—

"He shall, by virtue of his office, be a justice of the peace for the county, and if there is any liberty or borough in the county having a separate commission of the peace, for that liberty or borough also, and shall, unless disqualified to be chairman of the county council, continue to be such a justice during the year immediately after he ceases to hold his office."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 34, to leave out paragraph (d.)—(Mr. Heneage.)

MR. RITCHIE said, he had received representations from many boroughs which would render it desirable that these words should not be retained. He would, therefore, agree to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he wished to know, as a matter of Order, whether it would be competent for him now to move his Amendment, No. 116, which had reference to the paragraph the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) proposed to leave out? The Chairman had called upon him just now to move his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the paragraph is struck out, of course the hon. Member's Amendment will fall to the ground.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he had not the smallest objection to the omission of the paragraph; but he thought, as a matter of Order, that as the Chairman had called upon him he ought to have been permitted to make his statement upon the Amendment.

MR. RITCHIE said, the hon. Member's Amendment would be altogether unnecessary, as, by the omission of the sub-section, the object he had in view would be secured.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he thought there was some misunderstanding in the matter.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he now had to move Amendment No. 124—namely, at the end of Clause 2, to add—

"(e.) He shall be entitled to receive as salary during the term of his office such sum, not exceeding _____ pounds per annum, as the council may determine."

He had left a blank for the amount of salary the Chairman would be paid supposing the Amendment were carried; but he certainly thought that the Chairman should receive a salary of some kind or other, as a great deal of work would be thrown upon his shoulders. He would, in all probability, be an ex officio member of all Standing Committees and most of the permanent Committees connected with the County Council, which would occupy a great deal of his time and impose upon him a large amount of labour; and, under the circumstances, it was very desirable that he should receive remuneration. He submitted the Amendment in the belief that it would be difficult to find men who would accept all the onerous duties of the office of Chairman unless there was something in the nature of emolument attached to that position.

THE CHAIRMAN asked how the hon. Gentleman proposed to fill up his blank?

MR. CONYBEARE said, he was not so well versed in the question of salaries to public officials as some hon. and right hon. Members opposite. He did not wish to make the remuneration equal to that attached to Cabinet rank in the Ministry; but if the omission in the Amendment interfered with its admissibility he would get rid of the blank by striking out the words "not exceeding _____ pounds per annum," which would make the Amendment read "such sum as the council may determine." If this was not acceptable he would fill in the blank with a nominal amount, say £300 a-year.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end of the Clause to add the words:—(e.) "He shall be entitled to receive as salary during the term of his office such sum as the council may determine."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and negatived.

MR. CONYBEARE rose to move Amendment 126, as follows:—

In page 2, at end, to add—(6) "From and after the passing of this Act every justice of the peace shall be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of the county upon the recommendation of the county council, and every parish shall be entitled to nominate, and, through the elected representatives on the county council, to demand the appointment of one or more of such persons as they may deem fit to act as resident justices of the peace for the said parishes. And the selected councillors shall in every case be taken from among the local justices of the peace so nominated and appointed as aforesaid."

It would, perhaps, be rather dangerous for him to remark upon this Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment No. 126 is out of Order, and I therefore call upon the hon. Member to move Amendment No. 127.

MR. CONYBEARE said, that the next Amendment on the Paper, No. 127, was in his name, and he should certainly like to say something in explanation of the proposal contained in it, which he believed was a novel one. The Amendment was as follows:—In page 2, at end, add—

"(5.) As respects the standing committee of the councillors—

(a) The county council shall elect by ballot from among its own members a standing committee, for the purposes of superintending the administration of the county in the intervals of the sittings of the county council, and of regulating and controlling the county finance;

(b.) The term of office of a member of the standing committee shall be three years;

On the ordinary day of election of the member of the standing committee in every year, one-third of the whole number of the standing committee shall go out of office and their place shall be filled by election;

The third to go out shall be the members of the standing committee who have been longest in office;

(c.) If the county districts are less than in number, then so far as is possible one member at least of the standing committee shall be chosen from each county district, that is to say, he shall be either an elective councillor returned by or a selected councillor residing in an electoral division comprised in or comprising or consisting of the county district from which he shall be deemed to be chosen. If the county districts are or more than in number, then the county council shall from time to time combine the county districts or some of them into groups for the purposes of this section, and so far as is possible one member at least of the standing committee shall be chosen in the manner before mentioned from each of the county districts (if any) which have not been included in any such group of county districts, and one member at least of the standing committee shall be chosen from each of such groups of county districts as if each of such group of county districts were a single county district;

(d.) On a casual vacancy upon the standing committee arising, an election shall be held in the same manner as an election to fill an ordinary vacancy, and the councillor elected shall continue to be a member of the standing committee until the councillor in whose place he is elected would regularly have ceased to be a member of the standing committee, and he shall then cease to be a member of the standing committee;

(e.) The chairman of the county council shall be ex officio a member of the standing committee during his term of office;

(f.) At every meeting of the standing committee the chairman of the county council, if present, shall be chairman. If the chairman of the county council is absent, then such member of the standing committee as the members of the standing committee then present shall choose shall be chairman;

(g.) The standing committee shall from time to time make standing orders for the regulation of their proceedings and business, and may from time to time vary or revoke the same; but any standing orders so made, and any decision of the standing committee for varying or revoking the same, shall be submitted to the county council for their approval;

(h.) There shall be paid to each member of the standing committee out of the county fund, as a general county purpose, a sum not exceeding one pound sterling per day during his attendance at the sittings of the committee."

Though there was a great deal to be said for it, he would prefer to let the question stand over till to-morrow, as the hour for adjournment had almost arrived. He would, therefore, move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Mr. Conybeare

MR. RITCHIE said, he would make an appeal to the hon. Gentleman not to press the Motion, as it seemed to him (Mr. Ritchie) that if the hon. Member desired to take the decision of the Committee on the Amendment it would be much more convenient to do so at a later stage of the Bill. It was hardly germane to the present clause, and would be more appropriately dealt with when they arrived at that part referring to the instructions given to the County Council. He understood that the hon. Gentleman desired to enact that there should be Standing Committees, and that point could be fairly discussed at a subsequent stage. If the hon. Member would withdraw his Motion they would probably be able to get through Clause 2 that night.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he certainly could not explain what he desired to effect by this Amendment in the three minutes which was left to them before the hour at which the House, by the new Rules, must adjourn. He was not sure that they could not have discussed the principle contained in the Amendment before proceeding to other parts of the Bill, and it seemed to him that it would have been desirable to have the principle of this Amendment in their minds before discussing the question of the control of the police; but he would yield to the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion, asking him to be kind enough to state upon what clause his Amendment could best be discussed.

MR. RITCHIE: I think Clause 78 (Incorporation of County Council).

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member withdraw his Motion?

MR. CONYBEARE said, he would withdraw the Motion on the Paper, and would move it on Clause 78.

THE CHAIRMAN: I mean the Motion for reporting Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) said, the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for the Lonsdale Division of Lancashire (Mr. Ainslie) was an important one, and had been put down at the request of the Lancashire magistrates; but as it would not be possible to discuss it that night, perhaps the Government would undertake to consider it, with a view to its acceptance at a later stage.

It was as follows:—In page 2, at end, add—

"As respects the vice-chairman of council, it shall be the duty of the chairman, as soon as may be after his election as chairman, to appoint a councillor to act as vice-chairman during the illness or absence of the chairman, and to fill any vacancy which may occur in the office of vice-chairman. A vice-chairman may, while acting as such, do all acts which the chairman as such might do, and shall be entitled to take the chair at any meeting of the council at which the chairman is not present."

SIR UGHTRIED KAY-SHUTTLE-WORTH said, that this was an important matter, in which a great number of people in Lancashire were interested. There seemed to be no power in the Bill, as it stood, to enable a County Council to appoint a Vice-Chairman, and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would consider the desirability of creating such a power on Report.

MR. RITCHIE assented.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

BAIL (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 286.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, he did not now propose to ask the House to proceed with the Bill, but desired to make a short statement. Some of his hon. Friends in Committee suggested that it would be only right that when an appeal was allowed to the Public Prosecutor that some allowance should be made to meet the costs of prisoners defending themselves against such appeal. It was a matter not quite within the discretion of the Lord Advocate; but he had communicated with the Treasury, and they saw no objection to costs in such cases being allowed.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN BILL.—[BILL 145.]

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

I

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for going into Committee on the said Bill be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Law, &c."—(Mr. Stuart-Wortley.)

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda) asked, was there any proposition for adding representatives of the working classes to the Committee in relation to the Bill?

MR. SPEAKER said, that was a matter for the Committee of Selection.

Question put, and agreed to.

CLERKS OF THE PEACE BILL.

[BILL 185.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said, he desired to give the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) an opportunity of expressing his intention in regard to this Bill, and, to put himself in Order for the purpose, he would formally move that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Brunner,)—put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Appointment of deputy clerk of the peace in case of incapacity, &c., of the clerk).

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.), said, he hoped the hon. Member did not propose to go through the clauses now. [MR. BRUNNER: No.] He (Mr. Matthews) was not opposed to the principle of the Bill, and had, indeed, intended to bring in a larger measure to allow deputies to be appointed, not only for Clerks of the Peace, but Stipendiary Magistrates.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Brunner,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday next.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (IRELAND) ACT (1877) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 281.]

(Mr. Chance, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Maurice Healy.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN) (Dublin University) said, the Government did not object to the second reading of this Bill, which was to remove a technical difficulty found to exist in the working of the Court of Appeal. It might be necessary to propose certain Amendments in Committee; but, so far as he was concerned, he saw no objection to the second reading.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, might he ask what the Bill was about? It was somewhat unusual to take a second reading without the slightest explanation.

MR. MADDEN said, it was rather for the promoters to state the object; but he might say, shortly, it was to enable the Court of Appeal in Ireland to enforce orders in certain cases by issuing writs. It was found in practice that where cases could not be remitted to the Court of First Instance to issue writs the case had to remain with the Court of Appeal, and the Bill was intended to supply the defect. So far as he had examined the Bill, it appeared to be a useful measure, introduced by the hon. Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance). In matters of detail it might require Amendment, but he did not oppose the second reading.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he had a great objection to all Bills introduced by lawyers for reforming the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland, though the Court needed reform. But if the object of the Bill was limited, as the hon. and learned Gentleman said and he approved, he (Mr. T. W. Russell) would not object.

MR. MADDEN said, the hon. Member would understand that he did not introduce the Bill, nor assented to the second reading.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

ENNISKILLEN, BUNDORAN, AND SLIGO RAILWAY BILL [REPAYMENT OF DEPOSIT].

Resolution [June 13] reported.

"That it is expedient to authorise the repayment of the sum of Three thousand two hundred and seventy-five pounds Three Pounds per Centum Consolidated Annuities, being the sum deposited in respect of the application to Parliament for 'The Enniskillen, Bundoran, and Sligo Railway (Donegal Extension) and Enniskillen and Bundoran Extension Railway (Abandonment) Act, 1879,' which in pursuance of section thirty-six of that Act is now forfeited, together with any interest or dividends thereon."

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

Debate arising.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

BRISTOL PORT EXTENSION RAILWAYS [CANCELLATION OF BOND].

Considered in Committee.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the release of the sum of Seventy-seven thousand and twelve pounds three shillings, the amount of the Bond, dated 29th July, 1864, entered into by the Bristol Port Extension Railway Company and Charles Waring (since deceased) and Henry Waring, under the provisions of Section 48 of "The Bristol Port Extension Railways Act, 1864," and that the Solicitor to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury shall deliver up to Henry Waring and the Executors of the late Charles Waring, or either of them, the said Bond in order to the cancelling thereof.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES— CHINESE IMMIGRANTS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he could communicate to the House the telegram which was stated to have been received with regard to the resolutions adopted at the Australasian Conference recently held on the subject of Chinese immigration?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD), in reply, said he had received the following telegram, which, he thought, would sufficiently show that the hope he entertained that the matter would be fully and carefully discussed from all points of view had been fully justified.

"14th June.—At the Australasian Conference held in Sydney on the 12th, 13th, and 14th inst., at which the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and Western Australia were represented, the question of Chinese immigration and your cablegram to the Governor of South Australia in connection therewith were fully considered. The members of the Conference are sensible of the wish of Her Majesty's Government to meet the views of the colonies, and have specially deliberated upon the possibility of securing legislation which, while effective, should be of a character so far as possible in accordance with the feeling and views of the Chinese Government. They have not overlooked the political and commercial interests of the Empire nor the commercial interests of the colonies. In 1886 the total exports to China from New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania were valued at £16,000 out of a total export trade amounting to £38,700,000. Our imports from China in the same year were valued at £846,000. While the custom of the colonies, therefore, is very valuable to China, that country offers no present outlet of importance for Australasian trade. There has never been any attempt on the part of any of the colonies to close their markets to the imports of the Chinese Empire, although most, if not all, of them are now produced in great quantities in the British Empire of India. The suggestion that any restrictions which are to be imposed should be of a general nature, so as to give power to exclude European or American immigrants, has been very carefully deliberated upon, but no scheme for giving effect to it has been found practicable. As the length of time to be occupied in negotiations between the Imperial Government and the Government of China is uncertain, and as the colonies in the meantime have reason to dread a large influx from China, the several Governments feel impelled to legislate immediately to protect their citizens against an invasion which is dreaded because of its results, not only upon the labour market, but upon the social and moral condition of the people. At the same time the Conference is most anxious that Her Majesty's Government should enter into communication with the Government of China, with a view to obtaining as soon as possible a treaty under which all Chinese except officials, travellers, merchants, students, and similar classes should be entirely excluded from the Australasian Colonies. By way of assisting to bring about such an understanding the Conference has recommended the abolition of the poll tax now levied upon Chinese immigrants. While believing that the local legislation now proposed will accomplish its object, the Colonies would prefer that the exclusion of the Chinese should be brought about by international agreement of a friendly nature, as in the case of the United States. The Conference further desires that Her Majesty's Government should induce the Governments of the Crown Colonies of Hong Kong, Straits Settlements, and Labuan to at once prohibit the emigration of all Chinese to the Australasian Colonies, unless they should belong to the classes above mentioned. The Chinese who may claim to be considered British subjects in those Colonies are very numerous, and the certainty that their migration hither was prevented would give great and general satisfaction. The resolutions arrived at by the Conference, and which have been embodied in a draft Bill, are as follows:—1. That, in the opinion of this Conference, the further restriction of Chinese immigration is essential to the welfare of the people of Australasia. 2. That this Conference is of opinion that the desired restriction can best be secured through the diplomatic action of the Imperial Government and by uniform Australasian legislation. 3. That this Conference resolves to consider a joint representation to the Imperial Government for the purpose of obtaining the desired diplomatic action. 4. That this Conference is of opinion that the desired Australasian legislation should contain the following provisions:—(1) That it shall apply to all Chinese with specified exceptions; (2) that the restriction should be by limitation of the number of Chinese which any vessel may bring into any Australian port to one passenger to every 500 tons of the ship's burden; (3) that the passage of Chinese from one Colony to another without consent of the Colony which they enter be made a misdemeanour. The first and fourth resolutions were indorsed by all the Colonies except Tasmania, who dissented, and Western Australia, who did not vote; while the second and third were carried unanimously. As a whole, therefore, they faithfully represent the opinion of the Parliaments and peoples of Australia. In conclusion, the Conference would call attention to the fact that the treatment of Chinese in the Australian Colonies has been invariably humane and considerate, and that in spite of the intensity of popular feeling during the recent sudden influx good order has been everywhere maintained. In so serious a crisis the Colonial Governments have felt called upon to take strong and decisive action to protect their peoples; but, in so doing, they have been studious of Imperial interests, of international obligations, and of their reputation as law-abiding communities. They now confidently rely upon the support and assistance of Her Majesty's Government in their endeavour to prevent their country from being overrun by an alien race, who are incapable of assimilation in the body politic, strangers to our civilization, out of sympathy with our aspirations, and unfitted for our free institutions, to which their presence in any number would be a source of constant danger."

THE EARL OF CARNARVON asked who had sent the telegram?

LORD KNUTSFORD said, it was sent by Lord Carrington by desire of the Conference.

HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY THE LATE GERMAN EMPEROR.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, it is my melancholy duty to announce to this House what, no doubt, is already known to many of your Lordships—the death of the Emperor of Germany. I need not say how deeply we grieve for the loss of one so justly valued both here and in Germany. Our Queen has lost a beloved son-in-law, and Germany a most enlightened ruler. It will be your Lordships' desire to put on formal record the sympathy which you feel for the afflicted relatives, and for the nation that has lost so much. I therefore give Notice, according to precedent, that I shall move an Address to Her Majesty the Queen and an Address to Her Imperial Majesty the Empress of Germany, on Monday next.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, in the absence of my noble Friend who leads the Opposition in this House (Earl Granville), and who is prevented from being present, I should not like to let this opportunity pass without saying that I am certain that every word that has been said by the noble Marquess opposite is fully echoed on this side of the House. If I may be permitted to say something on my own behalf, I would add that, apart from the high respect always felt for one in so great a position as that occupied by the late Emperor, and the admiration which all of us have for the noble qualities which he displayed throughout his career, those who had the honour of being personally known to him must have felt that he was one who inspired the deepest feelings of attachment to him on the part of all who had the privilege of his acquaintance.

STREET IMPROVEMENTS (METROPOLIS.)

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MEATH asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether it was necessary that Piccadilly Circus, one of the principal sites of the Metropolis, should be disfigured by rough balks of timber supporting an unsightly wooden railing placed round a small paved space in the centre of the Circus; and, if so, how long Piccadilly Circus was likely to remain in this apparently uncared for condition? He supposed that the balks of timber were kept in their present position to show that the Metropolitan Board had not given the place up to the public. It was a pity that this spot, and others elsewhere, should be surrounded by unsightly hoardings when temporary railings could be set up on certain days in the year to prove that there had been no dedication to the public. He was aware that the Metropolitan Board, as regarded its health, was in a very unsatisfactory condition, and that it was often the case that a man in extremis looked upon mundane affairs with different eyes from a man who was strong and vigorous. At the same time, he hoped the noble Lord might be able to assure their Lordships that although the life of the Board was not likely to be very prolonged, it would act as private individuals were supposed to act in that condition, and that it would set its affairs in order so as to transmit them to its successor in a satisfactory state. He might add that, although the Board had been the object of much hard hitting lately, yet he was certain that there were large numbers of the public who felt that they owed a debt of gratitude to the Board for all it had done in the way of improving the Metropolis, especially for its two greatest works—the main drainage of London and the Thames Embankment.

LORD MAGHERAMORNE said, he had to thank the noble Earl for his kind recognition of the services of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which had been, and were now, being unduly, and he might say most atrociously, assailed in many quarters. He confessed that there were subjects which he would not allude to, because he saw present the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Herschell), who was the head of the Commission which was investigating them, and he would not have touched on the subject at all had not the noble Earl done so; but he should not be worthy of his position as Chairman of the Board, which he had held for 18 years, if he did not say that he considered the great bulk of his colleagues to be as noble and as straightforward men as any in either that or the other House of Parliament. He said that fearlessly, and he defied anybody to prove the contrary. When he was asked whether, when they retired, they would hand on to those who should succeed them everything in the best possible form, he answered, "Yes, we will do it." They would stick to their work and hand it over to those whom Parliament might select to succeed them. As to the special point of the noble Earl's Question, he could only say that the Board was now considering what should be done with the vacant site in Piccadilly Circus. The balks of timber, which the noble Earl did not seem to think pretty—and he agreed with him—had been placed there for the purpose of reserving the control of the Board over the place, it being undesirable to subject it to the unfettered discretion of the Vestry. Their reason for thus acting was this. Their Lordships were all aware that wherever there was an open space there were all kinds of ideas as to what should be done with it, and many suggestions had been made and many plans proposed for the adornment of this site. One proposal was that a statue or fountain should be erected; another that an artistic lamp-post should be set up; and a third that the place should be planted with trees. Another fanciful suggestion was very curious—namely, that a retiring room should be built underneath it, but this idea certainly did not find favour with his colleagues. He thought the Metropolitan Board might be proud of its West End streets and of the communication at this particular point; and they were anxious, if they were to die—and it seemed they were to die—but be that as it might, they would like as long as they were given the power in their own days to put something, or let somebody else put up something, which would be a credit to the Metropolis, in what he considered to be one of the best spaces of London. There were so many different suggestions that the matter required careful consideration. They were giving it that consideration, and he hoped before they were extinguished that they should be able to give an opinion and a decision on that important question, and he would assure their Lordships that they would be guided in their decision by the desire that the adornment of this fine site should be a credit to the Metropolis.

ENNISKILLEN, BUNDORAN, AND SLIGO RAILWAY BILL [REPAYMENT OF DEPOSIT].

RESOLUTION. [AJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [14th June].

“That it is expedient to authorise the repayment of the sum of Three thousand two hundred and seventy-five pounds Three pounds per Centum Consolidated Annuities, being the sum deposited in respect of the application to Parliament for ‘The Enniskillen, Bundoran, and Sligo Railway (Donegal Extension) and Enniskillen and Bundoran Extension Railway (Abandonment) Act 1879,’ which in pursuance of section thirty-six of that Act is now forfeited, together with any interest or dividends thereon.”

Question again proposed.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.) said, he could not get satisfactory information with regard to this Bill. He had asked a Question about it yesterday, but could not obtain a satisfactory reply. He had requested to be informed who were the sponsors for the Bill in the House, as there seemed to be no one promoting the measure whatever; but his query remained unanswered. Now, in 1879, the promoters of the Donegal Extension Bill obtained Parliamentary powers on condition that they made a railway within five years. Those promoters paid on deposit a sum of £3,275; but this, in 1884, was forfeited by reason of the non-performance of the conditions upon which the Bill was obtained. Now, after nine years had elapsed, some parties unknown to him came to that House and sought a Bill to obtain the repayment of this £3,275 already forfeited to the Treasury, and as one of those who came from the centre of the district that would have been largely benefited commercially by the railway, and as Chairman of the Town Commissioners in that locality who aided the promoters at that time to obtain the Bill, he thought it was only fair that he should be answered when he asked if all the necessary conditions had been fulfilled. The Chairman of Committees was the only person in the House who could give him any information yesterday, and, of course, that was not satisfactory.

He wanted to know had the necessary notices been inserted in The Dublin Gazette, and he desired, also, to know whether any claim for compensation had been made, and if any payments had been made in respect of compensation? He also wished to ask to whom the money was to be repaid? One gentleman, Mr. McBirney, Dublin, who was connected with the promotion of the former Bill, and who, he (Mr. Jordan) was almost sure, had paid the whole of this £3,275 by way of deposit, was now dead. Another gentleman, Mr. Bloomfield, who was connected with the railway, and who had, he believed, paid no money by way of deposit, however, was alive, and he (Mr. Jordan) should not like to see the money go into the wrong hands. He should like to see it paid to the proper person—that was to say, to the heirs and successors of that gentleman who had paid it originally in the form of a deposit. It was only fair, at any rate, that he (Mr. Jordan) should have information upon the subject, being interested in the part of the country to which the original Bill applied. He would move, if it were competent for him to do so, that the Resolution be reported upon this day three months.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that it is not competent for him to make that Motion. The hon. Member can move that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. JORDAN said, he did not wish to delay the Bill. All he wanted was some satisfactory information in the matter. It would be as well for him, perhaps, to move the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (MR. COURTNEY) (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, that if the hon. Member moved the adjournment of the debate, he would prevent him (Mr. Courtney) from giving him an answer. As to the Motion now before the House, he could satisfy the hon. Member and give him all the information he sought in the matter. The hon. Member had correctly stated the facts. This railway was one of the many projects sanctioned by Parliament, and subsequently abandoned. When Parliamentary powers were applied for, a deposit was paid in as an earnest that the railway construction was to be carried out, and in order to meet any claim which might arise in consequence of the action of the promoters of the Bill. That deposit, in the present instance, as the hon. Member had stated, owing to the non-fulfilment of the conditions upon which Parliamentary powers were given, was forfeited to the Crown. This Bill was a release on the part of the Crown of the money so forfeited. The hon. Gentleman wished to be assured as to whether any demands for compensation had been settled, and he also wished to be certain that the money would be paid to the persons rightly entitled to it. This Bill, which was in the strictest accordance with all previous measures dealing with such questions, released the claim of the Crown, and ordered the High Court in Dublin to pay the money deposited, subject first of all to the payment of all claims established against it to the persons who were entitled to it, and who paid the money in the first instance, or to their survivor or survivors. The first thing the High Court did in a case of this kind was to advertise for any claims, and when claims were established, after a certain interval there was a settlement, and the Court proceeded to distribute the money to those entitled to it. Whatever guarantees the hon. Member wished to have rested with the High Court, which followed the ordinary course in regard to sums paid into Court, first in advertising for claims, then in examining those claims, and paying those which were genuine, and, subsequently, in paying the remaining money to those entitled to it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Enniskillen, Bundoran, and Sligo Railway Bill, that they have power to make provision therein pursuant to the said Resolution.

QUESTIONS.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE,
(IRELAND) ACT, 1887—SECRET INQUIRY
AT FALCARRAGH, CO. DONEGAL.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.) (for Mr. T. M. HEALY) (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Does Mr. Hamilton, R.M., deny that any investigations in furtherance of the secret inquiry he was holding at Falcarragh, County Donegal, in respect of the alleged conspiracy against Mr. Olpherts, a local landlord, were conducted in Mr. Olpherts' house by Detective Reeves, who accompanies and assists Mr. Hamilton R.M.; were Thomas Carr, Alexander Wilson, and James Lindsay examined in Mr. Olpherts' library by Detective Reeves in presence of Mr. Olpherts and his son, or were they questioned at all by Reeves; and, if so, by whose authority and under what legal process; was Thomas Carr asked why Mr. Olpherts found it impossible to have his pigs conveyed last month to Derry Market, and James Lindsay whether he was told that Mr. Hugh Boyle, grocer, Falcarragh, refused to fetch a little box to Derry for Mr. Olpherts; was Brian M'Callin, a labourer in Mr. Olpherts' employment, taken from his work to the library, and by Reeves asked his name, his residence, whether Hugh Boyle, grocer, Falcarragh, refused in his presence to carry to Derry for Mr. Olpherts a certain box, and whether he had any information to give; whether, as this examination had not the desired result, M'Callin was told to go, Reeves remarking to Mr. Olpherts that there was no use in bringing that man up; and, whether Mr. Hugh Boyle, the grocer who was alleged by Reeves to have refused to carry for Mr. Olpherts, was then summoned before Mr. Hamilton, R.M., at the secret inquiry, and sent to gaol for refusing to answer?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Resident Magistrate does deny the allegation contained in the first paragraph of the Question. District Inspector Reeves reports that the inquiries he made of Mr. Olpherts' three servants named, related entirely to the Boycotting of that gentleman, which was not embraced in the Resident Magistrate's inquiry. He did see these servants in Mr. Olpherts' house. Mr. Olpherts and his son were not present. The District Inspector acted in the discharge of his duty. Hugh Boyle is a public carrier, also a grocer, in the neighbourhood; and it was in regard to alleged refusals on his part to carry goods for Mr. Olpherts that District Inspector Reeves made inquiries of Carr and Lindsay. He likewise questioned M'Callin. He did not, however, say there was no use in bringing him up. Hugh Boyle was examined as a witness before the Resident Magistrate touching the Plan of Campaign; and refusing to answer questions he could have answered in regard to that conspiracy, was committed to prison.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if it was by direction, and with the knowledge of the magistrates, that Mr. Reeves held the inquiry; and I wish to know if the Government have a right to hold a private and unsworn inquiry in a private house, preliminary to the statutory inquiry at the Petty Sessions Court-house before the Magistrates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is certainly in the power, and it is the duty, of a police officer to make inquiries when a crime has been committed. This is not a preliminary inquiry under Section 1 of the Crimes Act, as the hon. Gentleman seems to think. It is quite clear that the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) entirely confused two different inquiries which were going on at the same time, or nearly at the same time.

MR. SEXTON: Were the witnesses who were examined by Reeves at Mr. Olpherts' house afterwards summoned to the sworn inquiry, and questioned on the same affairs?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He was not questioned on the same affairs. Boyle was alleged to be guilty of two separate offences — one was Boycotting Mr. Olpherts. The other subject on which he was supposed to be able to give evidence was the Plan of Campaign. He was examined on one point by the police officer, and on the other by the magistrate.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state under what authority, either in this country or in Ireland, have police officers a right to hold such an inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand it was the universal practice both in this country and in Ireland.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) inquired on what authority the right hon. Gentleman said Boyle could answer questions about the Plan of Campaign?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt he could have done so.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—REGENT'S PARK.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he is able to state that such arrangements have now been made with Sir Charles Warren, the Chief Commissioner of Police, as to ensure proper control and supervision in and around the Regent's Park, with a view to prevent a recurrence of the disgraceful scenes which have for some time past taken place there; if he proposes to have the vacant grass land between Gloucester Gate and the North Gate properly enclosed, or to adopt other means for public security and the prevention of misconduct within the area of the Park; and, if he will define the relative position of the "Woods and Forests," the 'Department of Works,' and the police, with reference to the Park and roads, and state the Acts of Parliament under which their duties are respectively carried out?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The Chief Commissioner of Police has made certain alterations in the system of patrolling the roads in Regent's Park, which have, I believe, ensured a better control of disorderly persons; and I have put myself in communication with the Crown Estates Paving Commissioners, with a view to improving the lighting of the Inner Circle—a change which I am assured by the Police Authorities will greatly assist them in the performance of their duties. The enclosing of the grass land between Gloucester Gate and the North Gate would, I think, prevent a considerable amount of misconduct in that part of the Park; and I have applied to the Treasury to sanction the necessary expense of such enclosure. As to the third paragraph of the Question, I am afraid I can not add much to the definition which I gave in answer to my hon. Friend on the 7th of this month, except to say that the Acts of Parliament on which that definition rests are, as regards the position of the Woods and Forests and the Department of Works, the 14 & 15 Vict., c. 42, secs. 22 & 23; as regards the duties of the Metropolitan Police within Regent's Park the 35 & 36 Vict., c. 15, secs. 7 & 8.

BANKRUPTCY ACT (IRELAND)—J. R. GUY AND THOMAS MORONEY.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether John R. Guy, a bankrupt, was within the past year tried and convicted by a jury on a charge of concealment of property and other offences against the Bankruptcy Act, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment; whether he was released by order of the Lord Lieutenant after a few weeks' imprisonment; whether Thomas Moroney has been now confined in prison for more than a year, without any trial or conviction, on a commitment by the Judge for unsatisfactory answering in the Bankruptcy Court; and, whether the Lord Lieutenant will order the release of Thomas Moroney as well as of John R. Guy?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, John R. Guy was released by direction of the Lord Lieutenant upon the medical officer's Report that further confinement would endanger his life. There did not appear to be any ground to apprehend that further imprisonment would endanger the life of Thomas Moroney, and the Lord Lieutenant had, therefore, no power to interfere.

TRAMWAYS ACTS (IRELAND)—PROVISIONAL ORDERS.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether several Orders in Council under the Irish Tramways Acts were passed more than two years ago, which the promoters have never since taken out, and on which the required deposits of 5 per cent on the estimates of the works have not been paid; whether the lines so sanctioned are mostly narrow gauge with excessively steep gradients, similar to the Skull and Skibbereen Tramway, which has proved a complete failure; whether the Royal Commission on Irish Public Works has reported against this class of tramways and against the adoption of any but the standard Irish railway gauge; whether serious liabilities are entailed on the ratepayers should the promoters fail to complete and work the lines once their construction has been commenced; and, whether, in view of the foregoing circumstances, the Privy Council will at once cancel all Tramway Orders which have been lying over for a considerable time, and have not been taken up, and on which the deposits have not been paid?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): There are five cases in which Committees of the Privy Council more than two years ago recommended Orders under the Tramways Acts, and in which the promoters have failed to take further action. Two of the lines so recommended were of the narrow guage. There are no Orders to be cancelled, as no such Orders have been made. If Orders should be applied for in cases which have been lying over for a considerable time, the Privy Council, before proceeding further with them, would no doubt take into consideration the lapse of time and other circumstances which have occurred since the lines were recommended and see that no injustice is done.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS— THE BLACKWALL TUNNEL.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) asked the hon. Member for the Knutsford Division of Cheshire, On what grounds the Metropolitan Board of Works have changed their original intention of proceeding at once with the vehicular tunnel at Blackwall; when does the Board expect to be able to commence the vehicular tunnel; how long will it take to complete the foot tunnel; and, what is the estimated cost?

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): In answer to the hon. Member's first Question, I must refer him to my answer given to the hon. and gallant Member for the Tower Hamlets, Bow Division (Sir John Colomb). The Board will be ready to enter into the first contract as soon as the question of rehousing the artizans displaced on the north approach has been decided by the Home Secretary, to whom an early application will be made to allow of rehousing in adjoining workmen's houses and unoccupied artizans' dwellings, constructed on surplus land sold by the Board. The general plans have to be approved by the Thames Conservancy, the Dock and Railway Companies, and they will be laid before them within 10 days. The Board's engineer advises us the first tunnel will be complete in 12 months from date of commencement. The estimate from drawings will not be made until their general approval.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART—THE NATIONAL GALLERY—RENEWAL OF THE GRANT.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether application has been made on behalf of the National Gallery Trustees for the renewal of the grant of £10,000 to the Gallery for the purchase of pictures; whether any reply has been received; and, whether he would have any objection, when complete, to lay a copy of this Correspondence upon the Table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The House is familiar with the arrangement concluded in 1885, on the occasion of the purchase of two pictures from the Blenheim Collection for £87,500. In assenting to the expenditure of this very large sum of money the then Board of Treasury intimated to the Trustees of the National Gallery that the ordinary purchase grant of £10,000 a-year would be suspended for some years, and this decision was made known to Parliament. At the same time, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers) expressed his readiness to consider favourably any proposal of the Trustees should any exceptionally advantageous opportunity occur of acquiring works of a representative character, and of a school or period of which examples are wanting in the Gallery. Since 1885 several applications have been made by the Trustees for a renewal of the purchase grant; but, so far as I have had to deal with them, I have said frankly that I was not prepared to depart from the arrangement made in 1885. I consider that continuity of policy is indispensable in such matters, on pain of Parliament never putting faith in declarations of intention made by the Executive Government; and so I have refused to entertain applications for a renewal of the annual grant.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman would lay the Correspondence on the Table?

MR. GOSCHEN said, he thought that no public advantage would be served by doing so. Such a practice was likely to lead to the members of Departments adopting a controversial style of correspondence instead of writing in a business-like manner.

INLAND REVENUE—EXCISE— LICENCES TO BREWERS' HOUSES.

MR. CALEB WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh) asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing the number of new licences granted, and of old licences renewed, or refused to be renewed, by the Licensing Justices during each year since the passing of "The Licensing Act, 1874" (No. 338, August, 1883); in continuation of that Return to the end of 1887, and in reference to every licence refused renewal, to state whether the licence has one, two, or three endorsements, or none; and also showing the number of licensed premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors owned by brewers and distillers?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. LONG) (Wilts, Devizes) (who replied) said: In accordance with the promise made on the 14th of May, the Home Office is endeavouring to obtain information as to the number of victuallers', beer-house, and other licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors, the renewal of which has been refused in the year 1886 and four preceding years by the Justices of each Licensing District, showing in each case the ground of refusal, especially when such ground was, in any instance, that the licence was not required, and showing also the result of appeal, if any. Pending this Return the Government could not assent to a Motion for the Return suggested by the hon. Member. It would be impossible to obtain information as to the number of licences owned by brewers.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS— ERROR IN AN EXAMINATION PAPER.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, in an examination paper on arithmetic set at an open competition for female clerkships held in March, 1888, the following question was put:—

"4. Express 15, 35, 63, and 72 as decimals of their least common multiple. If the product of these decimals be multiplied by the cube of the least common multiple of the given numbers and divided by their greatest common measure, show that the result is unity. Explain the reason of this in general terms without attempting the full numerical calculation;"

whereas the result ought to have been 945 and not unity; whether any steps were taken to inform the competitors of the error in the question; and, whether he will call the attention of the Civil Service Commissioners to this case, with a view to the prevention of similar mistakes, which must tend to embarrass competitors?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): (1) The question was given as stated above; (2) the error was not discovered in time to allow all candidates to be informed of the alteration that should be made, and therefore no candidate was informed of it; (3) the answers to this question were specially examined a second time to obviate any possibility of hardship; and (4) the Civil Service Commissioners do their utmost to prevent the occurrence of errors; but in all examination papers there must be a possibility, however carefully guarded against, of mistakes being made.

TRAWLING (SCOTLAND) BILL—BEAM TRAWLING.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the Government will consent to allow the Trawling (Scotland) Bill to be read a second time on the understanding that a Proviso will be inserted in Committee authorising the Fishery Board, with the sanction of the Secretary for Scotland, to make orders from time to time authorising beam trawling in specified areas in cases where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Fishery Board that such trawling will not be injurious to the industry of the line fishermen?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): The Government are not prepared to assent to the course proposed by the hon. Member. The question is one which should be dealt with in a Government Bill and not in a Bill brought in by a private Member. The Government are not prepared to take action at present.

LOSS OF LIFE AT SEA—EXAMINATIONS FOR BOATSWAINS, &c.—LEGISLATION.

SIR WILLIAM PEARCE (Lanark, Govan) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is his intention to introduce a short Bill, or otherwise give effect to the following recommendations of the Royal Commission on Loss of Life at Sea:—

“That a simple professional examination should be required for the rating of boatswains and carpenters; that seamen with the rating of A.B. should be required to have continuous records of their services; and that advance notes should be legalised, but strictly limited in all cases to the advance of one month's wages?”

THE PRESIDENT (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said he had given directions for clauses to be drawn dealing with the three Recommendations to which his hon. Friend referred. He proposed to circulate those clauses among the Associations and other persons connected with shipping; and if the replies he received were so generally favourable as to lead him to imagine that legislation on the subject would be non-contentious, he would try to find an opportunity for it this year; otherwise, he feared it would not be possible to do so.

LAW AND POLICE—ARREST AND DETENTION OF MR. JOHN MARA.

MR. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the fresh evidence has yet been forthcoming against Mr. John Mara, detained on remand by Mr. Newton on the charge of picking pockets, made against him on June 2 by two detectives; if he could state what was the evidence on which Mr. Mara was arrested and remanded; what is the nature of the expected evidence for which he is detained, who are the witnesses for whom the police are now searching, and have they yet been found; if they are not yet found, how long a time is it customary to detain prisoners on suspicion of committing a crime against whom no evidence justifying committal or conviction is forthcoming; on what ground did Mr. Newton refuse the bail that has already been tendered; is there any limit to the powers of the police to arrest on suspicion; if so, what are those limits; is there any limit to the powers of a police magistrate to remand waiting further evidence; and, will he lay upon the Table of the House the notes of the evidence given in Mr. Newton's Court at Marlborough Street in this case?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the magistrate that the case will be further heard to-morrow. Mara was remanded on evidence which, in the opinion of the magistrate, made out a prima facie case of attempting to pick the pockets of ladies at a crossing in Hyde Park. The magistrate does not know the nature of the evidence which will be given to-morrow. He informs me that it is customary to detain a prisoner charged with an offence of this nature until all the evidence is heard. The magistrate, in the exercise of his discretion, refused bail after hearing the evidence. The police have by statute the power to arrest any person whom they have good cause to suspect of having committed, or being about to commit, a felony. The power to remand is entirely within the magistrate's discretion. I must decline to lay the notes of evidence on the Table of the House, as the hon. Member will feel that it would be most improper that the House of Commons should interfere with the discretion of a magistrate in dealing with a part-heard case in a Court of criminal jurisdiction.

MR. CAINE asked, on what ground the magistrate had refused bail?

MR. MATTHEWS said, it was in the exercise of his discretion.

MR. CAINE gave Notice that he would repeat the Question on Monday.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON—TRANSFER TO THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

COLONEL DUNCAN (Finsbury, Holborn) (for Sir RICHARD TEMPLE) (Worcester, Evesham) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he will exempt the School Board for London from any liability under the Local Government Bill to have its duties and responsibilities transferred to the London County Council?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. LONG) (Wilts, Devizes) (who replied) said: There is no intention on the part of the Government that the duties and responsibilities of the School Board for London should be transferred to the London County Council; and when Clause 8 of the Local Government Bill is reached in Committee, the Government will be quite prepared to consider any Amendment with the view of showing clearly that no such arrangement may be made under the clause.

COUNTY ELECTORS ACT, 1888 — DECLARATIONS FOR PARLIAMENTARY ELECTORS.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether in the County Electors Act of May 16, 1888, Clause 6, Section 1, the date fixed for sending in declarations—namely, September 5, applies to boroughs and counties for Parliamentary and Municipal Registers as well as to the new County Registers, or whether the date which has hitherto been fixed—namely, September 12, will remain the last day for sending in declarations for Parliamentary elections?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's), in reply, said, that Section 6 (1) of the County Electors Act made September 5 the last day for sending in declarations.

METROPOLIS — HOSPITAL SUNDAY FUND—COLLECTIONS IN THE PARKS AND OPEN SPACES.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether on February 24, 1888, he approved an addition to the by-laws of the Metropolitan Board of Works, under which additional by-law the collections for the Hospital Sunday Fund have since been prevented on the open spaces under the control of the Board; whether he is aware that one prosecution has been actually commenced, and other prosecutions are now being threatened by the Metropolitan Board of Works, against working men and others for making collections on such open spaces in connection with otherwise lawful public objects; whether he will state to the House the facts on which his decision to create this new offence was based; whether public collections have been for more than 40 years made on the open spaces of the Metropolis for political, social, and public charitable objects; and, whether he will state any cases of evil resulting therefrom?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; at the time named I did approve a by-law prohibiting persons from soliciting or gathering money in certain Parks and open spaces from persons frequenting the same. I have not been able to ascertain at present whether the Hospital Sunday Fund collection has been prevented under this by-law. I am informed by the Board that in two or three cases the names of the offenders have been taken, the Board awaiting the result of the case now pending before a magistrate. In 1887 complaint was made to the Board by a ratepayer that the practice of soliciting money after meetings was being abused. A Committee of the Board thereon made inquiry; and they found reason to believe that certain persons availed themselves of the permission to hold public meetings for the sake of collecting money for their own purposes, and made a living by it. I cannot say whether collections have been made for more than 40 years in the open spaces of the Metropolis; but I am informed by the Board that it has not until recently been the practice in the Parks under their control. The Board do not allege any evil result beyond annoyance of which members of the public complained; and they proposed the by-law with the view of protecting the public from the abuse to which the practice was liable.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) asked the Home Secretary, whether he was aware that under this by-law the Sunday music provided by the Sunday League in the Parks would be absolutely stopped, as no collections could be made?

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) inquired whether, in the opinion of the Home Secretary, it would be for the public benefit to stop the collection for this music?

MR. MATTHEWS said, that he had given all the information in his possession to the House. The practice had grown up quite recently in the Parks under the control of the Board. He would inquire whether any evils had resulted from these public collections.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked whether, as a matter of ordinary law, persons could not be prosecuted if they asked for money for private purposes?

MR. MATTHEWS said, that he never attempted to solve questions of ordinary law with the hon. Member.

MR. J. ROWLANDS asked, what was the custom with regard to those Parks which were not under the control of the Metropolitan Board of Works?

MR. MATTHEWS said, that he was not aware, but would inquire.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) asked whether, in view of the fact that disturbance might probably arise from the carrying out of this by-law, he would order that these prosecutions should be discontinued where the collection had been made for a bonâ fide political meeting?

MR. MATTHEWS said, he was afraid it was beyond his power to make such an order.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that as this was a matter affecting the whole of the Metropolis, and as these collections had been made for a period of over 30 years, he should, in the event of obtaining no more satisfactory answer on Monday, move the adjournment of the House, to call attention to the subject as a matter of urgent public importance.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACT--ERECTION OF LABOURERS COTTAGES--FERMOY BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that on the 2nd of May last a Resolution was carried by the Board making the expenses of the erection a Divisional instead of a Union charge; and, whether the Local Government Board will insist on the Guardians furthering the construction of suitable dwellings for the poor labourers at this the most suitable time of the year for building?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I shall now reply to the Question in the form in which it appeared on yesterday's paper. It is the fact that the erection of 157 cottages has been authorized in the Fermoy Union; 13 cottages, authorized by Provisional Order confirmed by Parliament in 1884, have been built; 144 others were authorized by Provisional Order made in June, 1887; but none of these have yet been built. The latter Order became absolute in October last, and an arbitrator was appointed by the Board of Works in February last; but the arbitration proceedings necessarily took some time. The Board of Guardians originally made the whole Rural Sanitary District the area of charge, and it was accordingly so fixed by the Provisional Order of 1887. Such a resolution as that referred to was passed by the Guardians in May last, but it was inoperative inasmuch as the Guardians have no power to alter an area of charge determined by a Provisional Order which has become absolute. Under the circumstances, the Local Government Board cannot take any steps with the view of compelling the Guardians to hasten their proceedings in the case.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—ACTION AGAINST "THE TIMES."

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth) asked Mr. Attorney General Whether there is any foundation for the suggestion which has appeared in the public Press, in reference to an impending action against The Times, to the effect that the Government have placed at his disposal information respecting the Irish Members of this House which is in the possession of the Government?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I have not seen, nor have I any knowledge of, any suggestion or statements which have appeared in the Press. The hon. Member must, I think, be aware that I should be guilty of gross breach of duty if I were, directly or indirectly, to answer this Question, or to make any statement respecting it from which any inference, direct or indirect, could be drawn.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): The Secretary of State for the Home Department is not under a similar obligation; and I would ask him if the Government have placed at the disposal of the Attorney General, for the purposes of a private action, any real or imaginary information?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I absolutely decline to give any information whatever.

PERU AND CHILI—THE PERUVIAN BONDHOLDERS.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact that a Protocol was signed in Santiago, on the 11th of April last, between Senor Don Augusto Mattè, Chilian Minister for Foreign Affairs, and Hugh Fraser, Esq., Her Majesty's Minister, resident in Chili, relating to the terms of a contract known as the Grace-Aranibar Contract, recently entered into between the Peruvian Bondholders Committee and the Government of Peru; if it is a fact that in that Protocol it is clearly represented that Chili will submit to no departure from the terms of her Treaty of Peace with Peru, and that Mr. Fraser, in signing the Protocol, assented thereto; whether, since the said Protocol was signed, Her Majesty's Government has received any other proposals in writing from the Chilian Government for a settlement of the claims of Peruvian bondholders; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table of the House the said Protocol, and the other proposals, if any, of the Chilian Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer this Question. On the 12th of April last Mr. Fraser announced that the Chilian Government had made confidential proposals to Her Majesty's Government for the amendment of the Articles of the Grace-Aranibar Contract to which they had taken exception, and also proposals for the settlement of the claims of the bondholders against Chili. These proposals, so far as relates to the contract, have been transmitted in the form of a Protocol, which was signed by Her Majesty's Minister at Santiago ad referendum; and the Chilian Government, in a separate document, have submitted certain bases of arrangement for a combined settlement of the bondholders' claims on Chili and Peru. The proposals, being confidential, cannot be laid on the Table.

THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES—CHINESE IMMIGRANTS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he was in a position to give the House the substance of any cable messages received from Australia embodying the result of the Conference at Sydney on the Chinese question?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): In answer to the hon. Member I will read to the House a telegram which has been received this morning from the Governor of New South Wales, reporting the result of the Conference held at Sydney. The telegram is as follows:—

"14th June.—At the Australasian Conference held in Sydney on the 12th, 13th, and 14th instant, at which the Colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and Western Australia were represented, the question of Chinese immigration, and your cablegram to the Governor of South Australia in connection therewith, were fully considered. The members of the Conference are sensible of the wish of Her Majesty's Government to meet the views of the Colonies, and have specially deliberated upon the possibility of securing legislation which, while effective, should be of a character so far as possible in accordance with the feeling and views of the Chinese Government. They have not overlooked the political and commercial interests of the Empire, nor the commercial interests of the Colonies. In 1886 the total exports to China from New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania were valued at £16,000, out of a total export trade amounting to £38,700,000. Our imports from China in the same year were valued at £846,000. While the custom of the Colonies, therefore, is very valuable to China, that country offers no present outlet of importance for Australasian trade. There has never been any attempt on the part of any of the Colonies to close their markets to the imports of the Chinese Empire, although most if not all of them are now produced in great quantities in the British Empire of India. The suggestion that any restrictions which are to be imposed should be of a general nature, so as to give power to exclude European or American immigrants, has been very carefully deliberated upon, but no scheme for giving effect to it has been found practicable. As the length of time to be occupied in negotiations between the Imperial Government and the Government of China is uncertain, and as the Colonies, in the meantime, have reason to dread a large influx from China, the several Governments feel impelled to legislate immediately to protect their citizens against an invasion which is dreaded because of its results, not only upon the labour market, but upon the social and moral condition of the people. At the same time, the Conference is most anxious that Her Majesty's Government should enter into communication with the Government of China with a view to obtaining, as soon as possible, a Treaty under which all Chinese, except officials, travellers, merchants, students, and similar classes should be entirely excluded from the Australasian Colonies. By way of assisting to bring about such an understanding, the Conference has recommended the abolition of the poll tax now levied upon Chinese immigrants. While believing that the local legislation now proposed will accomplish its object, the Colonies would prefer that the exclusion of the Chinese should be brought about by international agreement of a friendly nature, as in the case of the United States. The Conference further desires that Her Majesty's Government should induce the Governments of the Crown Colonies of Hong Kong, Straits Settlements, and Labuan to at once prohibit the emigration of all Chinese to the Australasian Colonies, unless they should belong to the classes above mentioned. The Chinese who may claim to be considered British subjects in those Colonies are very numerous, and the certainty that their migration hither was prevented would give great and general satisfaction. The Resolutions arrived at by the Conference, and which have been embodied in a draft Bill, are as follows:—

1. That, in the opinion of this Conference, the further restriction of Chinese immigration is essential to the welfare of the people of Australasia.

2. That this Conference is of opinion that the desired restriction can best be secured through the diplomatic action of the Imperial Government and by uniform Australasian legislation.

3. That this Conference resolves to consider a joint representation to the Imperial Government for the purpose of obtaining the desired diplomatic action.

4. That this Conference is of opinion that the desired Australasian legislation should contain the following provisions:—

(1.) That it shall apply to all Chinese, with specified exceptions.

(2.) That the restriction should be by limitation of the number of Chinese which any vessel may bring into any Australian port to one passenger to every 500 tons of the ship's burthen.

(3.) That the passage of Chinese from one Colony to another without consent of the Colony which they enter be made a misdemeanour.

The first and fourth Resolutions were indorsed by all the Colonies except Tasmania, who dissented, and Western Australia, who did not vote; while the second and third were carried unanimously. As a whole, therefore, they faithfully represent the opinion of the Parliaments and peoples of Australia.

In conclusion, the Conference would call attention to the fact that the treatment of Chinese in the Australian Colonies has been invariably humane and considerate; and that, in spite of the intensity of popular feeling during the recent sudden influx, good order has been everywhere maintained.

In so serious a crisis the Colonial Governments have felt called upon to take strong and decisive action to protect their peoples; but in so doing they have been studious of Imperial interests, of international obligations, and of their reputation as law-abiding communities.

Baron Henry de Worms

They now confidently rely upon the support and assistance of Her Majesty's Government in their endeavour to prevent their country from being overrun by an alien race, who are incapable of assimilation in the body politic, strangers to our civilization, out of sympathy with our aspirations, and unfitted for our free institutions, to which their presence in any number would be a source of constant danger."

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—COUNTY COUNCILLORS.

In reply to Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne),

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, the duty had been cast upon the Local Government Board of fixing the number of County Councillors for each county. The printed proposals of the Government were entirely provisional. He would be perfectly prepared to consider any representations made to him on the subject.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—TREATMENT OF PRISONERS AT LOUGHREA.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a Question of which I have given private notice. It is this—Whether his attention has been directed to the statement made as to 11 prisoners who were arrested under the Coercion Act in Loughrea on the day before yesterday, and detained for one night in the Bridewell. The statement is—"That we protest against the treatment that we have received since our arrest. We were taken from our beds at 3 o'clock on Wednesday morning and marched to the police barrack, where we were detained until 2 o'clock, when we were taken over to the Petty Sessions Court, and forced to listen to the reading of depositions until 6 o'clock, when our application for bail was refused, and we were committed to Loughrea Bridewell—we consisting of 11 men—where there is only accommodation for three, and where even the beds of these three were almost wet, and quite filthy. In the interests of those who may be committed to gaol we feel bound to make this protest."

I wish to know whether there is any truth in this protest; and whether the right hon. Gentleman will undertake to ascertain if there is truth in this statement of treatment, endangering the lives of these men; and, further, I wish to ask him whether he can furnish any information to the House as to a collision which took place yesterday in the town of Loughrea between the people and the police, at which some 30 people are said to have been injured?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I only got Notice of the Question when I came down to the House at 2 o'clock. I immediately telegraphed to Dublin; but I have received as yet no information on the subject.

MR. DILLON: Can the right hon. Gentleman give any security—as this is a matter which may affect the lives of these men, and as the offence with which they are charged is a trivial one—can he give the House any assurance that, if the facts turn out to be true, he will take some steps to see that these people are not injured?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, Sir, the Irish Government will, in this as in every other case, do all they can to secure the proper treatment of prisoners.

GERMANY—DEATH OF HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY FREDERICK III.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to inform the House that Her Majesty's Government have received information of the death this morning, at a quarter past 11, of His Majesty the German Emperor. It will be my duty, on Monday, to move an Address to the Crown and to the Empress of Germany, expressing the deep sorrow and concern of this House at the calamity which has overtaken the Royal Family and the people of Germany.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, I have only to say how deeply all sections of this House associate themselves with the sentiments which the right hon. Gentleman has expressed, and with the grief that is felt at an event which is not only an affliction to this country, in consequence of the connection of the late Emperor of Germany with the Royal Family of England, but which, I am sure, is felt to be an irreparable loss by all the nations of the civilized world.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

NATIONAL DEBT (SUPPLEMENTAL) BILL.—[BILL 264.]

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, that before the Bill was read a third time he should like to have some explanation or assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) in reference to the question of annuities in the Bill. The market price of 3 per cent was taken as the basis for calculating annuities, and he thought the House ought to have some information in regard to the annuities under the Trustee Savings Banks Act. He held in his hand a Return from the National Debt Commissioners made on the 11th of May, 1888, and it would be found that the value of the assets, according to Acts of Parliament, differed, being fixed in one at £47,944,217, and by the other at £45,853,108, and showing a large deficiency. That deficiency would have to be met by the Commissioners of the National Debt, and he should like to have an explanation from the right hon. Gentleman as to what the effect of the present Bill would be upon the deficit.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, he had mentioned this Bill yesterday, but he wished the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to understand that if it was in any way inconvenient he would not press for the information he had then asked for. Probably the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give it before the end of the Session. He (Sir William Harcourt) wanted to know what measures had been taken in reference to the Debt which was still unconverted? There was, however, another matter upon which he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question in regard to the Bill. Great changes had now been made in the position of the National Debt. The Treasury had been good enough, in reply to his Motion, to give a Paper containing some fuller information as to past transactions in reference to the Debt than had been given before; but what appeared to him to be desirable and perfectly feasible was that the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt—as a Department of the State—should make an Annual Report of their transactions, just as the Post Office, the Inland Revenue, and the Customs did. It was a Department comprising many officers, and supported at considerable expense, and it was only experts and those who understood these most complicated matters who were able to give information upon them. The transactions were of an extremely complicated character, and there ought to be a Report presented year by year. He would go further, and he should like to have the history of what had been done with reference to the Debt since the great war in 1815. He believed there were ample materials for compiling such a history, and it was certainly information that ought to be in the hands of the public. He would, therefore, be glad if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) would hold out a prospect of making this an interesting feature in connection with the reform of the Debt in which the right hon. Gentleman's own career would take a distinguished part.

MR. W. BECKETT (Notts, Bassetlaw) said, that before the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, he wished to put a question as to the reduction of interest in connection with the Post Office Savings Banks. The margin of profit made by the Post Office Savings Banks was now very small; and as the reduction of interest on Consols would convert that profit into a loss, he would like to know when it was intended to reduce the rate of interest payable by the Post Office Banks; and whether it should not be reduced at the same time as that of the Trustee Savings Banks?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): In answer to the question put to me by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner), the point he has raised is one of considerable interest, but really it is not touched by the provisions of the present Bill. The annuities dealt with by the present Bill are annuities to be granted after the passing of the Act. If the hon. Member desires further information as to the deficiency in the Trustee Savings Banks fund, of course I shall have to prepare to give it. With reference to the question put to me by my hon. Friend the Member for the Bassetlaw Division of Notts (Mr. W. Beckett) as to the reduction to be made in the interest upon the deposits in Post Office Savings Banks, it is clear that the rate of interest will have to be reduced. The same kind of measure will have to be applied to the Post Office Savings Banks as I was compelled to suggest in the case of the Trustee Savings Banks. I cannot say the precise date or the precise form in which the change will be made, but it is a question which must claim the early attention of the Government. It is extremely difficult to deal with all these matters at the same moment, as all of them involve questions of great complexity, and must be approached with the greatest care, in order to prevent injustice. In reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), I may say that I am at present engaged in considering the best means of dealing with the amount still outstanding from the conversion. Perhaps I may take this opportunity of stating that the amount of Consols which is still outstanding is £40,467,771, and the amount of Reduced is £6,009,968, making a total of £46,477,739. These are the latest figures I have been able to obtain, and the reduction is still going on, as the conversion is still open to those residing at considerable distances. With regard to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, all I can say is that it is in contemplation to have that Report made annually by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. It is extremely desirable to place clear and precise information upon all these matters before the House, and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman and the House that I will do what I can in the way of making further improvements in the statement of the National Debt, and in simplifying, as far as I can, what I admit are, in their present form, somewhat complicated figures. I will also consider to what extent the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman can be carried out by issuing an exhaustive Report of the history of the National Debt during a course of years. Of course, I have very able assistance in producing such a Report, and I am quite sure that Sir Rivers Wilson, the Controller General, will give his best attention to the undertaking.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) said, he believed that such a Paper would be a most interesting document. He hoped that it would be issued in such a form that those who wished to compare the state of the National Debt now with what it was in other years would have no difficulty in doing so.

MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot accept the suggestion of the hon. Member, because it sometimes involves difficult matters when we undertake to make comparisons in a Return of this kind, and might throw the subject into some confusion. Therefore, I cannot bind myself as to the form in which the Return shall be made, or how far it will follow the form of the Return of the proceedings of the National Debt Commissioners. It is a difficult task to adjust the figures in such a way as both to have a comparative and statistical interest and not to avoid confusing the public mind to a certain extent. I will examine the point, and, if it is desirable, will see that the document is reprinted.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) said, he hoped that the Annual Return which was called by his name, and which he had moved for at the request of the Treasury for many years, would be continued, although, perhaps, another column might be added to it.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he hoped that the Government would take this opportunity of the reduction of the interest in the Post Office Savings Banks to devise some scheme by which indirect pressure would be brought to bear upon the holders of deposits to induce them to become larger holders of Consols, in order to get as large a number of persons as possible interested in the National Debt of the country.

MR. GOSCHEN: I entirely sympathize with the object of the hon. Member, and I think the House will sympathize with it also. It is extremely desirable that the depositors in Post Office Savings Banks should become large owners of Consols. I am glad to say that the number is increasing, and I will endeavour to formulate a plan by which it may continue to increase.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) said, he was not sure that he was quite in Order; but he wished to ask, with regard to the interest to be allowed in the case of Savings Banks, whether it was the object of the Government to assimilate Post Office Savings Banks and the National Securities Savings Banks, so that the interest in both cases should be as far as possible the same?

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) said, he wished to know whether, in dealing with the interest of the Trustee Savings Banks, any steps would be taken to prevent the wrongful use of the name of the Government?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member should be aware that there is a Committee about to be appointed to inquire into the management of Trustee Savings Banks, and one of the questions with which they will have to deal—in regard to which I shall put a Notice on the Paper this evening—is the description which is sometimes given of these banks, and which occasionally involves to some extent the deception of the public. In reply to the hon. Member for East Aberdeen (Mr. Esslemont), I did not say that the amount of interest would be precisely the same in the Trustee Savings Banks as in the Post Office Savings Banks; but the relative rates will be maintained as they are now, there being a reduction of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent in both cases.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.—[BILL 182.]

(Mr. Ritchie, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Long.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 14th June.]

[SIXTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

COUNTY COUNCILS.

Clause 2 (Composition and election of Council and position of chairman).

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said, that before his hon. Friend the Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) moved the first Amendment on the Paper he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) to the wording of the second line of this clause. He did so in no hostile sense, but with a view of securing that the drafting of the Bill should be improved. The clause spoke of "the administrative business of the justices of the county." He thought that that was a new phrase in legislation. It was certainly a very slipshod phrase, if he might use the word, and it would be very difficult to devise what the transference of administrative business precisely meant. He would suggest the substitution of the words "jurisdiction and power," phrases with which they were perfectly familiar.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, he was much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for having called his attention to the matter, but he would rather not make any alteration then. He would, however, consider the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.), in moving, in page 3, line 7, to insert as a paragraph—

"The preparation and revision of a basis or standard for the county rate, which, with such additions and modifications as may be necessary, shall be the basis or standard for all rates leviable in the county," said, in moving that Amendment, he could not understand why Clause 5 provided that in relation to the preparation or revision of a basis or standard for the county rate, or in relation to appeals by any overseers or persons against that or any other rate, should be retained in the hands of the Justices, and not transferred with the other powers to the County Council. The rating question in the counties was a very big one, and he did not think it should continue on its present basis. The state of assessment and valuation in the counties was extremely unsatisfactory. What they wanted to arrive at was a uniform system of valuation and assessment. He was quite certain the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board knew that there had been many unsatisfactory incidents connected with the present system. Some residences were said to be so spacious and splendid that it was impossible to fix the assessment, because not lettable. The right hon. Gentleman would also be aware that there had been cases where the Chairman of the Court of Quarter Sessions had himself appealed against the assessment made by the Committee of the Union, and had got it reduced. He maintained that the ideal at which they should aim was the Metropolitan model. He was not very proud of the way in which the government of the Metropolis had been administered, but the system, as a rule, was good. Under the Act of 1869 there was a quinquennial valuation, so that every five years the whole property of the Metropolis was revalued, and the rateable value fairly represented the property of the Metropolis, while the contributions to the rates kept abreast with the wealth of the community. Perhaps he might be allowed to point out how the system worked, because he thought it would be generally appreciated. Every five years there was a revaluation; the overseers' forms were filled up as to the rent and terms of holding, and the occupier had notice of increase or decrease, and could appeal to the Assessment Committee. The surveyor of taxes was always present, and had such large powers that he could insist on his own value being taken, so as to make unfairness or jobbery almost impossible. Of course, there were provisions for intermediate valuations between the quinquennial periods. When any property was rated for the first time or the assessment increased, it was placed in a provisional list by the overseers, and notice of the increase in the value was given to the owner, who could object, if he chose, and go before the Assessment Committee. Then, if he were not satisfied with the decision of the Assessment Committee, he could carry the case still further and appeal to the Assessment Sessions, and thence to the Court of Queen's Bench. The Assessment Committee inserted the new rateable value in a supplemental list, which, together with all other lists, was taken into consideration when the quinquennial valuation was made. The advantage of this system, he thought everybody would admit, was obvious, especially in regard to the application of the Schedule to the Act of 1869, under which there was a certain fixed proportion deducted from the gross value, sometimes amounting to a sixth, sometimes a fifth, and sometimes a fourth. He believed that it would be impossible to obtain an equal and regular system of assessment upon valuation except under some provision of this kind and he, therefore, moved the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 7, after "namely," insert as paragraph (i).—The preparation and revision of a basis or standard for the county rate, which, with such additions and modifications as may be necessary, shall be the basis or standard for all rates leviable in the county."—(Mr. Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DUGDALE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton) said, he had been somewhat surprised to hear the hon. Member refer to the work of the Assessment Committee as purely administrative business. He should have described it as one of the most essentially judicial duties of Quarter Sessions. The methods of the assessment and the levying of rates were laid down in a Statute of 1852, which provided for the appointment of a County Rate Assessment Committee, and it gave them power of levying rates, of having all the officers before them, and examining them on oath. After that was done, the rate was sent to the overseers and submitted to the Vestry, and the overseers were required to forward any objections they might have to the County Rate Assessment Committee, who were compelled to fix a day for hearing such appeals. The County Rate Assessment Committee thereupon appointed a meeting, heard the overseers, or whoever made an objection to the basis of the rate, and, after hearing them, settled the rate, and laid it before the general Court of Quarter Sessions. The Court of Quarter Sessions could alter it in any way they liked; and by the Act of 1852, when confirmed by them, it became the basis for the county rate. So far he did not think there was very much objection to the functions of the Court of Quarter Sessions being transferred to the County Council; but Sections 17 and 18 of the Act of 1852 gave parishes and persons affected a right of appeal to the Quarter Sessions against the decision of the County Rate Basis Committee. Section 17, which gave that power of appeal, placed appellants in the usual position of persons appealing. They were to issue notices and state the grounds of appeal, and to go through all the forms of procedure in an ordinary case of appeal. When the cases came on for hearing, the Quarter Sessions were required to hear witnesses on oath, and he did not think the County Council would be a proper tribunal to perform such a duty as that. Therefore, although he thought the making of the basis might be transferred to the County Council, he was of opinion that it would be unwise to put on them the judicial business of hearing appeals.

MR. RITCHIE said, the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) did not quite, as far as he could see, embrace all the matters which he had referred to in his speech. The hon. Member desired to have a new system of valuation and a uniform system of assessment. In regard to that, the Government were in entire accord with the hon. Gentleman. Originally, these matters formed a portion of the Local Government Bill; but so many clauses were intricate and controversial that, at the last moment, it was found quite impossible to deal completely and satisfactorily with so large a question as that, in addition to the other important subjects in the Bill. They, therefore, struck those clauses out; but he hoped that they might have an early opportunity of dealing with the whole question of valuations, and he was inclined to agree with the hon. Gentleman that if they were to take any standard on which the present system was to be amended or reformed, probably the system existing in the Metropolis was the system which they ought to take. Therefore, although there was no proposal of that kind in the Bill at present before the Committee, he could assure the Committee it was not because he was not fully aware of the great importance of the subject. He earnestly hoped that within a reasonable time the Government would be able to deal with the whole question. As far as the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman on the Paper was concerned, it dealt with two questions. One of them was the question of the basis of the standard county rate, and the other was the question of the basis of the standard of all rates leviable in the county. In regard to the question of the preparation of a basis for the County Rate, he had listened attentively to what his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Nuneaton Division of Warwickshire (Mr. Dugdale) had said, and he agreed with most of the observations which fell from his hon. and learned Friend. As the Committee were aware, they did not propose in the Bill to transfer the duty of the preparation of the standard or basis of the county rate to the County Council, because they desired to deal with that question also in connection with the whole system of valuation; but they had received large numbers of representations from Quarter Sessions in all parts of the country, strongly urging them, along with the duty of levying the rate, to transfer the preparation of the basis of the rate to the County Council. They were, therefore, prepared to accept that portion of the proposals which were made in various Amendments on the Paper, in accordance with the view of his hon. and learned Friend. They were prepared to propose an Amendment by which not only the levying of the county rate, but the preparation of the basis of the county rate, should be transferred to the County Councils. But in reference to the appeals which were twofold—an appeal by the parish against the assessment of the county authorities, and another, an appeal by an individual against the rating in his particular case—these appeals appeared to the Government to have an important judicial element connected with them; and they did not, therefore, propose to make a transfer as far as the question of appeals was concerned, but they proposed to leave the question of appeal, as now, in the hands of the judicial authorities which now exist in the counties—namely, the Quarter Sessions. He hoped the suggestion he had made would meet with the acceptance of hon. Members who had put down Amendments on the Paper. He proposed to move the insertion of the following Amendment, in page 3, line 12—“And the preparation and revision of the basis of the plan for the county rate.” With regard to other rates, he wished to remark that there were a large number of Unions which overlapped counties, and until they had all matters brought within the area of the county they could not give the County Authority power to deal with them. Some Unions were in as many as three counties, and if they gave to the county the power of fixing the basis for all rates, there might be three different bases in the same Union.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, that although he was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the concession he had made, he did not think that it went quite far enough. Speaking of the experience he had gained in connection with the County of Lincoln, he might say that they had been now waiting for 15 years for a new county rate. The whole assessment at the present moment was entirely unsatisfactory—for instance, the docks of Grimsby had sprung up and had made the value very different from what it was. Then, again, the assessment for the different Unions was framed on entirely different principles, so that it was utterly impossible to arrive at any uniform basis by a comparison. Therefore, unless the Government were prepared to go one step further, it appeared to him that they would be in exactly the same position after the Bill was passed as they occupied now. He had placed an Amendment on the Paper giving the County Council—

“The revision of the present county and poor rate assessments, and the preparation of one uniform basis or standard of assessment for all rates leviable within the area of their jurisdiction under this Act, as well as the hearing and deciding of all appeals in relation to the county, district, or local rates.”

The object of his Amendment was to secure that there should be one uniform assessment for all purposes, whether for county rate, district rate, or local rate. He himself would go much further, and desired that there should be one collection and one Department. What he desired was that in consultation with the Revenue officers some authority or other—and he could not conceive a better authority than a County Council—should have power to lay down an assessment that should be the sole assessment for all purposes throughout the county. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would undertake to bring in a valuation Bill, or some clause that would enable a provision of that nature to be carried out. As far as the speech of the right hon. Gentleman went, he was much obliged to him for the concession he had made, although he thought it did not go far enough.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.) said, he thought there ought to be power on the part of one parish to appeal against the course pursued in another, instead of allowing matters to go on as they did at present. One parish ought to be able to go in and see that another parish was kept up to its proper valuation.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) said, he had heard with satisfaction the concession which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had made in this matter; on the wider subject of valuation generally, he thought it was, perhaps, unreasonable to press the Government at this stage. He was glad to hear the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for the Nuneaton Division of Warwickshire (Mr. Dugdale) that as regarded rating the functions of Quarter Sessions should be limited to hearing appeals. He should like to point out that this was, in fact, to adopt the principle of the Amendment he had on the Paper, which exactly carried out the view of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. It provided that the County Council should have "the preparation and revision of the basis or standard for the county rate." He had also an Amendment on Clause 5 reserving appeals to the Quarter Sessions. He understood that to be the principle adopted by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) said, he was afraid he had not followed the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board clearly, and he therefore wished to ask him what was the purport and extent of the clauses it was originally intended to include in the Bill which dealt with the question of the basis for the assessment of the rate? Was it to extend beyond the county rate, and apply to the whole of the rates in the county? He had no desire to raise any objection against the Bill of the Government; but he was bound to express his very great regret at the statement the right hon. Gentleman now felt himself compelled to make. If there was a subject of primary importance, then he maintained that in any scheme for the reform of County Councils the question of assessment and the fixing of all the rates within the county on a uniform system was of the greatest importance. It was not a question which needed argument, and the right hon. Gentleman could not deny its importance, because it was originally part of his measure. Comparing it with other matters that were contained in the Government proposals, what could there be so important for the simplification of the affairs of county government as securing a uniform assessment of property, and why should it not be undertaken now? The Government had intended to undertake it, and it formed the subject of a certain number of clauses in the Bill with that object. They were not very numerous, and they were not clauses which were likely to be discussed in a contentious spirit. The uniformity of assessment was not a Party question. Every Member of that House, to whatever Party he belonged, was bound to desire uniformity of assessment, at any rate throughout the county, if not throughout the country altogether. Since the right hon. Gentleman put the Assessment Clauses in the Bill, and afterwards withdrew them, certain things had happened—for instance, the right hon. Gentleman had withdrawn the Licensing Clauses, which were contentious, and would have occupied much more time in discussion. He would therefore suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should take an opportunity of revising his intention of not including the Assessment Clauses within the Bill, with the view of reinstating those clauses, and, at any rate, of giving his Bill a more respectable appearance when it was passed in the shape of an Act than it now presented. The functions to be handed over to the County Councils were very limited in their nature. They were to manage the main roads, to look after the lunatic asylums, and they were to have something to do, although he did not know exactly how much, with the police. Those were not very large functions—in fact, hardly sufficient to justify the creation of the new Body and the position it was intended to occupy in the county. There was a clause, it was true—namely, the 8th clause, which was of a very remarkable character—to enable by Orders in Council all the administrative business of almost every Department to be handed over without any actual discussion or assent on the part of Parliament to the future County Councils. That clause would have to be discussed in due time. He did not think it would meet entirely with the acceptance of the House; but before anything of that kind was attempted, which the right hon. Gentleman himself regarded as an important matter, in the future establishment of County Councils, surely they should endeavour to deal with the question of assessment. The right hon. Gentleman had told the House that he entirely agreed in the opinion that the securing of uniformity of assessment in the counties was a great object, and he took it from the right hon. Gentleman that he originally thought he could accomplish that object in this measure, and that it would not be necessary to introduce a separate Assessment Bill. The right hon. Gentleman only withdrew the clauses because he thought they would occupy too much time. He had an opportunity now of reinstating them, and it was perfectly certain that they would be discussed in a non-contentious spirit. All desired that the Bill should be reasonably amended, wherever it was necessary, so that when it became law it should be as complete as possible. Moreover, it would reflect greater credit on the right hon. Gentleman, on the Government, and on the House if they could succeed in carrying these clauses.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.) said, he should like to say a few words on this subject, seeing that it was one in which he took a considerable interest when he first entered Parliament 25 years ago. No one would accuse the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) of any desire to defeat the Bill. So far as he was aware, the right hon. Gentleman had supported the Government wherever he could, and had acted fairly and straightforwardly in the discussion of the measure; but, in spite of that, the effect of the acceptance by the Government of the proposal the right hon. Gentleman had so insidiously made would be tantamount to the defeat of the Bill. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to remember what had happened already on the subject of assessment. The first Select Committee upon which he ever sat in that House was one appointed in 1866, and it was engaged for that whole Session upon this single question of assessment. If hon. Members knew anything of the discussions which took place in that Committee they would be aware that the subject was discussed with an utter absence of Party spirit; but there were numberless Divisions and endless differences of opinion in regard to points of valuations, as to the amount of deduction to be made in calculating the rateable value of property, and especially as to the powers to be given in relation to the Revenue officers arising from a uniform assessment for Imperial and local purposes. The result of the inquiry of the Committee was that a Bill was introduced by different Governments on more than one occasion in that House—a Bill of 35 or 40 clauses—but no Government ever succeeded in passing it into law, although Members of all shades of opinion were agreed as to the desirability of introducing the principle of uniformity of assessment. Yet with all this information before him, and with the Departmental knowledge he must have obtained when at the Local Government Board, the right hon. Gentleman calmly, at this stage of the Bill, with he did not know how many clauses contained in it, in the middle of June, asked his right hon. Friend to introduce this most difficult and complicated subject into the Bill, and add some 25 or 30 clauses to it. If that was not practically an attempt to defeat the Bill he did not know what was. It was their duty to act in an impartial spirit. The first thing, in his opinion, to be done was to institute reform of county government. When that was done, no doubt, the powers of the tribunal instituted might from time to time be increased; but it would be as absurd to try to place in this Bill all the matters with which county government might have to deal, as to insert in a measure for the reform of Parliament all the social changes which those who promoted Parliamentary reform might hope to secure from a reformed Parliament. Therefore, with as strong a feeling as the right hon. Gentleman could possibly entertain of the desirability of securing uniformity of valuation for Imperial and local taxation through the machinery they were now setting up, and with the firm intention, as expressed by his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, of taking the subject up at the earliest possible moment, the Government could not consent to encumber and defeat their Bill by inserting such clauses as the right hon. Gentleman suggested.

Mr. Stansfeld

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon) said, he could not altogether agree with the remarks which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. For 30 years they had looked for the promised Valuation Bill, and they wanted, if possible, to get some instalment without waiting for another 30 years. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill whether something might not be done by this measure, and by a very simple addition to the Amendment before the Committee? The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had pointed out that it was impossible to take up the last part of the Amendment, making the standard for the county rate the standard and basis for all the rates of the county, because in a great many counties the boundaries of the county cut the boundaries of the Union. That was a very reasonable objection; but in a great many counties that was not the case, and, as he understood the Bill, it was intended that where they did cut the boundary of counties there was to be a revision of boundaries. He thought the following addition to the Amendment would meet the case—namely, “where or as soon as the boundaries of the county do not cut the boundaries of the union.” If the Government would adopt that principle, it would be possible to give a good instalment of what they all wished.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was afraid it would be impossible to deal with the question in the off-hand way suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. It would be necessary to give suggestions as to the lines upon which the boundaries were to be settled. Such directions would be absolutely necessary, and clauses that would be essential for the proper carrying out of the view of the hon. Gentleman would be very numerous. Therefore, to come to a satisfactory concession in a few lines, as suggested by the hon. Gentleman, was hardly possible.

MR. LAWSON asked if the Government were inclined to go no further than the first line of the Amendment?

MR. RITCHIE: We shall be prepared to accept the first line.

MR. LAWSON said, that, in those circumstances, he should not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 12, after the word “found,” to insert “the preparation and revision of a basis or standard for the county rate.”—(Mr. Channing.)

Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

MR. HENEAGE, in moving an Amendment in the same clause, to insert, at the end of line 15—

“The appointment, control, and dismissal of chief constables, and the management of the police in pursuance of this Act,” said, his object was to hand over the control of the police to the County Councils. He was bound to say that since he put the Amendment on the Paper circumstances had very considerably altered, because the Licensing Clauses of the Bill had been withdrawn; but, at the same time, he still objected to the proposal of the Government to give the control of the police to a joint committee of the magistrates and the members of the County Council. For his own part, he was in favour either of one or the other; and eventually there could be no doubt that the control of the county police would be given to the County Council. Therefore, in order to clear the way, he proposed to give them that control now by his Amendment; but he wished to make it perfectly clear that he should prefer that it should still remain in the hands of the magistrates than it should be handed over to a joint committee. If he did not carry his Amendment now, he should support an Amendment to provide that the control should be retained in the hands of the magistrates instead of being handed over to a joint committee. His objection to a joint committee was that it would be no joint committee at all. It would be a committee either of the Quarter Sessions or of the County Council. How was it to be elected? According to the Bill, it was to be elected one-half by the magistrates and the other half by the County Council, so that one-half, under any circumstances, must be magistrates; and if the County Council, in electing their half, elected one-half magistrates, three-fourths of the entire committee would be magistrates. If, on the other hand, in order to prevent the magistrates from having a predominant voice on the committee, the Council decided not to elect magistrates at all, the effect would be to exclude the most efficient magistrates. That was his chief objection to the present proposal of the Bill; but, for many other reasons, he thought that the County Councils had better deal with the police altogether. There were many duties which the police would have to perform under the County Councils with which the magistrates would have nothing to do. He, therefore, hoped the Government would either agree to place the police under the County Councils, or if they thought it would be better at the present moment that the control of the police should remain in the hands of the magistrates, let them take that course. He sincerely hoped that they would not agree to appoint a joint committee.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 15, at end, to insert the words "the appointment, control, and dismissal of chief constables, and the management of the police in pursuance of this Act." — (Mr. Heneage.)

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, which he intended to move in Clause 5, in regard to the powers, duties, and liabilities of the Quarter Sessions with regard to the police, and perhaps it would be convenient to the Committee to take the discussion of that question on the Amendment which had been moved by his right hon. Friend. This was a very serious question, and one which he hoped the Committee would not pass by in a light way. They were only seeking to retain the powers possessed by the magistrates in regard to the police, and they looked upon it as a question of vital consequence to the interests of the country. He looked upon the maintenance of law and order as the one which, above all others, should be in the hands of the magistrates; and if upon them devolved the duty of maintaining law and order, the police should be absolutely under their control. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) proposed to place them under the control of the County Council; whereas his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board proposed, with the exception of the appointment of the Chief Constable, which was to be retained by the Quarter Sessions, to place them under the joint custody of a Committee appointed by the Quarter Sessions, and one appointed by the County Council. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) contended that that was an unfortunate arrangement for many reasons. He wished to put the case very shortly—and he hoped without any prejudice—before the Committee. He thought they ought in this country to maintain, as far as possible, the control of the police in the hands of those persons who happened, from circumstances, to be in a position to undertake the duties of magistrates. Men of all classes, as soon as they were in a condition to support the position, tried by every means in their power to be made magistrates. It was a very laudable desire. [Laughter.] He saw that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) was very much amused; but he had no doubt that there were a good many persons who were anxious to become magistrates and perform the duties connected with the office. If they took away the position they now occupied from the magistrates and their sons, and did not give them something to do in the country—[Laughter.] He knew that would provoke a laugh from the other side of the House. But if they drove these men away and prevented them from rendering services that were, in his humble opinion, of great advantage to the counties, they would only drive them into the towns for amusement, instead of allowing them to learn the most useful part of man's education—namely, the administration of law and justice. That was one point he wished specially to call attention to; but there was another—and there he felt he was treading on delicate ground—but he would not mention names or places. Instances had occurred lately—he would not say where, or whereabouts, although a good deal had been stated in that House on the subject—where, if the whole control over the police had been in the hands of the County Councils, there was every reason to believe that in many instances there would have been a grave dereliction of duty. [Dissent.] Hon. Members shook their heads; but in dealing with a question of this kind it was most important to look at all the considerations involved, and, after mature consideration, to come to the conclusion which they believed to be the best, not only for particular localities and individuals, but for the whole country. He believed it would be far wiser, more prudent, and far better in the interests of the country that the police should remain, as they were at present, under the control of the Quarter Sessions, and it was with that object he had ventured to put down the Amendment which stood in his name on the Paper.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston) said, the Committee had in this case a means of testing the earnestness and sincerity of the Government in conferring upon the County Councils as much power and dignity as they undoubtedly ought to have. If the magistrates were to lose many of the powers which they had hitherto enjoyed, and which they esteemed so highly, why not give the new County Councils, which were to replace them, all the power and dignity the magistrates had enjoyed, and especially with regard to the control of the police? He was of opinion that the only way in which they could make local government successful was to give all the dignity and power they could to the elected representatives of the people. On that account he was anxious that the control of the police should be given to these Councils. There had been no complaint that the control which the large Corporations possessed over the police had worked badly. On the contrary, all the evidence showed that it had worked well, and he asserted fearlessly that some of the scandals of police administration which had appeared lately in the newspapers—and some of the instances occurred not far from where he was speaking—could not have occurred in localities that were controlled by Watch Committees. For that reason he supported the Amendment which had been moved by his right hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage). Last Session he had to bring before the House an instance of the brutal treatment on the part of the police of a child in his own Division, and that case would have been inquired into with much less friction in a borough where the Watch Committee had control. Having been a member of a Watch Committee, his own opinion was that it was most desirable that the representatives of the people should control the police of the district in which they were elected. He believed that course would bring about a far larger amount of sympathy between the people whom the police controlled and the police themselves. Nowadays there was a strong tendency to convert the police into a quasi-military force. He objected to that, because he wanted to see the police in closer sympathy with the people, and to bring that about it was necessary that they should be placed under the control of elected representatives of the people. He believed that the Amendment would accomplish that object. The hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) spoke of the preservation of law and order; but there were few instances of the violation of law and order in towns where a popularly elected Watch Committee controlled the police. It was only where the police were under the control of the magistrates or the Government that these questions of law and order cropped up. The best way to preserve law and order was to place the police under the entire control of elected representatives.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) said, the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Mr. Heneage) had declared his desire that the police should remain as they were, under the control of the magistrates.

MR. HENEAGE said, he had not said anything of the sort. What he had said was, that rather than leave them under the control of a joint committee he should prefer that they should remain as they were.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, there were four proposals before the Committee, and it would, perhaps, be better to consider them separately. There was the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, who wished the police to be under the control of a joint committee. The proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was that they should remain as they were. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) desired them to be under the control of the County Councils; and he (Mr. Stanley Leighton) had a further proposal that they should be under the control of the Home Office. He did not propose to consider the advantages or disadvantages of all these proposals at once, but he wished to suggest only the objections he entertained to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman that the police should be under the control of the elected Body. Now, an elected Body would not be always and altogether in favour of law and order. In certain cases the elected Body would be entirely in the hands of one class of the community, and that class might be opposed to the law. In the mining counties, for instance, it would be altogether in the hands of the Miners' Organization; and the Miners' Organization was, like every trade organization, not always in favour of law and order. These trade organizations, if they used their power, would be able to command a majority in the County Councils. Now, the police ought to have nothing to do with one class of the community or another. Their only business was to carry out certain laws passed in that House, and they ought not to be influenced in any way by any local or popular feeling. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last (Sir Walter Foster) said that all the evidence was in favour of the management of the police in large towns by an elected Watch Committee. He (Mr. Stanley Leighton) denied altogether that there was any evidence whatever to justify the assertion. On the contrary, the weight of evidence went against the theory that the Watch Committee of the towns managed their police either as well as they were managed in the counties, or in London, or in Ireland. There were certain Acts of Parliament that were never put in force at all by Town Councils. In some places, like Leicester, the authorities refused to put in force the Vaccination Acts; in other places these elected Bodies would not put in force the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts; and in others they would not allow the police to interfere with licensed houses, because a good many of them belonged to members of the Town Councils; in many of the boroughs they would not allow the police to interfere in any way with weights and measures; and in others the Food and Drugs Act was a dead letter. He was, therefore, justified in saying—and he did so without fear of contradiction—that these elected Bodies did not conduct their business satisfactorily on the whole. He thought that before this Bill was brought in it would have been prudent to have had a searching investigation into the manner in which the Town Councils had managed their affairs. The Commission which had considered the question in 1839, just before the new Constabulary were established, made this Report—

“It appears to us essential that any paid constabulary should, as far as possible without impeding their general action, be under the judicial supervision of the local magistrates.”

That Commission, at all events, was in favour of the police being under the control of persons who were responsible for the maintenance of law and order; and for these reasons he strongly opposed the Amendment.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON (Devon, South Molton) said, he was sorry that his right hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had moved his Amendment. In his opinion it was positively a mischievous Amendment, and, taking into consideration the views of his right hon. Friend on other questions, he was sorry that it had been moved. It was impossible for him, and he hoped that it was impossible for any other Unionist, in view of the question of Ireland, to vote for a proposal to hand over the control of police entirely to elected Councillors. [Ironical cheers.] He heard the cheer which hon. Members on that side of the House gave; but they did not shake his position in the least. If his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) went to a Division he should certainly vote with him, because on other grounds—not upon political grounds, but upon grounds of principle—he considered that the police and its administration should be under the control of and directed by a Judicial Body—he was in favour of placing the police under the control of a committee of magistrates, instead of handing them over to a committee of elected Councillors. He was quite aware that there were many objections to the compromise which had been offered by the Government. He knew from considerable experience—having served for many years on the police committee of his own county—that there were questions of friction and of difficulty that might arise; but, on the other hand, he preferred the compromise proposed by the Government to the Amendment proposed by his right hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby. He thought the Committee ought to view the matter as a very serious one. They need not only look to Ireland; but there were, unfortunately, other parts of the United Kingdom where popular feeling or popular excitement for the moment might interfere most unjustly and most unfairly with the practical administration of the law. [Cries of "Where?"] If hon. Gentlemen asked him "Where?" he should like to recall their attention to the position of affairs in many of the Welsh counties. The point was that it was the law; and the law, until Parliament thought fit to abrogate it, should be maintained. This was no question whether the law was just or unjust; and hon. Members were returned to that House by a democracy in their constituencies, and if the law was unjust they should get Parliament to repeal it, but as long as the law existed it was the duty of the Executive, with complete impartiality, to see that it was carried out. What he objected to was that they should be asked to offer any opportunity or means by which in times of excitement, or in the passion of the moment, the laws might be defeated, and their administration be obstructed by pressure being put on the police, and the police prevented from carrying out their first and primary duty. Before he sat down, he desired to say that if the police were to be prevented from performing that duty, experience had repeatedly shown that the only force on which the country could rely was one which it was most invidious and objectionable to use in such circumstances—namely, the military.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Sir, I am afraid that I shall not be able to keep the debate on so high a level as that to which it has been raised by my noble Friend (Viscount Lymington), who, according to his speech, seems to imagine that the real question at issue is not the control of the police, but that, at all events, the important consequential question is the dismemberment of the Empire. The touching appeals which the noble Lord has addressed to those whom he calls Unionists shows that he is duly impressed with the magnitude of the subject we are now discussing. The challenge of the noble Lord is very serious, because he says no Unionist will support the proposal except the renegade who proposed it. But my noble Friend will find there are more renegades than one, for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) had, in debating this very Bill, stated that he objected to the proposal of Her Majesty's Government, and that his vote would be in favour of placing the police under the control of the County Councils. Having now done justice to the lofty and statesmanlike elements which my noble Friend has introduced into the debate, I will descend to the more humble mode of conducting the discussion, which I think the Committee will be content to pursue. I regret that in some speeches—not from the Treasury Bench—an element of suspicion and distrust has been introduced. It has been stated, with a good deal of tact and caution, by the hon. Baronet opposite, and with much greater courage by the hon. Member who followed him, that they cannot really trust popularly elected Bodies with the administration of the police in connection with the maintenance of law and order. I venture to express the confident conviction that when the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board comes to defend the proposal, he will not found his defence upon any such ground as that a representative Body cannot be trusted in this matter, because, if no representative Body can be trusted, how deplorable is the position of the inhabitants of the great towns, who amount to half the population of the country, and who are in the most serious danger in respect of life and property in consequence of the arrangements made for giving them the control of the police. I have no mistrust of anybody in this matter. I am far from saying that the magistrates have misused their powers in this respect; and it is not because they have mismanaged the police, but because I think that the plan proposed by my right hon. Friend is more excellent, more historical, more traditional, more Conservative, and more agreeable to the ancient usage of the country that I shall heartily support his proposal. I must say one word, however, with regard to the magistrates. They are a

[Sixth Night.]

Judicial Body, and I do not think that as a Judicial Body they are particularly well qualified to exercise control over the police in the matter of the Game Laws. I think in that respect their control of the police might be attended with a certain amount of injurious effect. I am far from making any imputation on the magistrates; but I doubt very much whether the magistrates, personally concerned as they are to so large and special extent with the subject-matter of the Game Laws, are on that account the best chosen authority for the control of the police. However, I do not want to put the case on that ground. But the right hon. Gentleman said yesterday that he had an apprehension that the Bill was likely to lead to expense. Well, Sir, I am afraid that is not altogether a chimerical apprehension. We are now going to create a separate Body for the management of the police. But every new Body means new expense, and upon the ground of economy, if that were the only ground, I shall certainly prefer a plan which keeps the police under some Body, which is about to exist for other purposes, than a plan which creates a new Body for the sake of this arrangement. I think, however, what has been said in this and in former debates is of very great importance. We are now about to create new offices of considerable moment—at least, new offices which we wish to wear considerable dignity, and we can only invest them with dignity by giving them special functions. And, for my part, I own to the desire of giving to the County Councils every duty which it cannot be shown that they are disqualified from performing, or which it cannot be shown that they will perform worse than others. It is most important that in creating these County Councils we should not run the risk of setting up in any shape whatever offices of great prominence which, at the same time, will not be sustained in the mind and view of the people by adequate duties; because the immediate consequence would be that the quality of the men who will seek election will infallibly and very seriously decline. The County Authorities in my own recollection have had no connection whatever with the police. At the time when I came into Parliament there was not the slightest connection between the county and the police. The police were a parochial affair; they were appointed parochially, such as they were. No doubt they are defective, and require to be improved; but they are not defective because they are appointed under a representative authority. Go as far back as you will in history, and you will find that the management and appointment of police, as well as the responsibility for the maintenance of life and property, was admitted to be one of the very first and most essential functions of self-government. In my opinion, self-government without the maintenance and control of the police, and without responsibility for the preservation of life and property, is a mere skeleton or phantasm of self-government. And how came the magistrates to exercise the functions that they now exercise? Simply on this account—that it was thought right, very properly, to put the county police on a new and better footing, and there was no other County Authority whatever to whom, except the magistrates, the management of the police could be entrusted. When I come to a case like that of the Municipality of London, where there are 4,000,000 people to be protected in person and property, it may be wise to adjourn for a reasonable time the transfer of the Police Authority; but, unquestionably, in principle, in my opinion, whether it be in London, Liverpool, Birmingham, Glasgow, or elsewhere, the normal and the permanent arrangement—nay, the only arrangement—agreeable to the ancient usages of the country, is an arrangement which entrusts to the inhabitants, and the representatives of the inhabitants, the appointment and the control of those who are to see to the security of life and property. I earnestly contend that that is not only a tolerable, enduring, and allowable mode of securing that life and property, but that it is the best of all modes.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): The importance of the question now before the Committee is, I think, fully recognized by us all. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has adverted to ancient usages; but I do not think that we should derive much benefit in respect of this discussion from the system of parish constables. The old police of the country was of the most imperfect and inefficient kind. But I think I could show that the police force, such as it was, and totally inefficient as it was, was not entirely divorced, as this proposal would divorce it, from something of judicial authority. The old parish constable was under the authority of the Court Leet, and, primarily, he was the servant of the law, and not the servant of a merely public body, such as the Vestry, or any elective body. Judicial authority of some sort has always been deemed necessary in this matter, and to divorce them wholly from such authority would not be wise or expedient. There is a great deal of truth in what the right hon. Gentleman said—namely, that when the ancient and parochial system of police was set aside and superseded, there was no other visible body in the country to whom the management of the police could have been committed, except Quarter Sessions; but I apprehend that if the Acts dating from the beginning of this Reign were carefully looked at, that was not the only consideration which guided Parliament in the matter. Is it true that we can expect greater impartiality and calmness and more judicial temper in the administration of the law from a purely elective body than from the magistrates, or a body in which the magisterial element has its influence? I think not. I agree that a poacher in some parts of England has not much chance if he comes before a preserver of game; but it does not seem to me to touch the sort of control which we think it desirable to keep up. Though I am far from saying a word that would imply distrust of an elective body that had the confidence of the people, yet I do think the influences which operate on an elective body is a matter to be borne in mind. It is impossible that they should not be swayed not merely by a general sympathy with the people, which is a good thing, but by sympathy with temporary gusts of popular feeling, which is not always a good thing, and may lead to uncertainty in respect to the administration of the law. No doubt, when prejudice, passion, and feeling come into collision with some particular law, and when a special law becomes unpopular, a great gust of popular feeling arises which does not represent the true feeling of the country, but only the passion of the moment; and it must be recognized that a body of men dependent for election on the sympathy of the masses may be less able to resist that gust of feeling than the magistrates. An hon. Member opposite spoke of the manner in which the Watch Committees of the boroughs administered the police. I admit that it deserves admiration, but when the hon. Gentleman said there was never any disturbance of law and order in the boroughs, I would point out that—

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I said that certain breaches of the law which had occurred lately could not have arisen under the borough system.

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not know what the hon. Gentleman has in his mind at this moment, but I think the hon. Gentleman has forgotten the incident at Cardiff. I do not think electioneering influences are desirable things to introduce into the administration of the police. Can it be said that because there are magistrates in one county who are not in sympathy with the people, that where they are drawn from the people, they do not represent all classes and ranks of life? Such a position cannot be maintained. What, then, is there to lead us to say that they are not to have any share in the enforcement of the part of the law which is committed to them here? It seems to me that this Bill, in offering to the County Councils a joint share in the management and administration of the police, is as large a concession as can reasonably be made on this subject. The whole system of the financial part of the administration is committed to the care of the County Councils, and the various duties they have to perform are certainly sufficient to satisfy the ambition of any man likely to become member of a County Council without the extraordinary course of putting the whole force responsible for law and order into the hands of a purely elective Body.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton) said, he felt bound to say a word or two with regard to the observation of the Home Secretary that it was a matter of importance that the police should be under the control of the judicial authorities. He took exception to that observation as a matter of principle. If there was any authority which would do its work better by being confined strictly to its own duties, for very obvious reasons it was the judicial authority. And when the noble Lord behind him (Viscount Lymington) shrank from supporting the Amendment, because it would be setting up a bad example for Ireland in the future, when he asked whether they would hand over the control of the police in Ireland to elective Councils, he (Sir George Trevelyan) would ask him whether he was ready to accept the alternative, and hand over the control of the police in Ireland to the Justices of the Peace? But they need not go to Ireland. Let them look at Scotland, where law and order were maintained, and in no part of which were the police under judicial authority. They were under the Commissioners of Supply.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, he was in a position to state the exact contrary. The police force in Scotland was under a judicial authority—namely, the Sheriff of the county.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.) said, with the greatest deference to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, he wished to say that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was in error. The Sheriff had, no doubt, a voice in the control of the police, but no one knew better than the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the Sheriff had two distinct functions, one judicial and the other representative of the Crown. It was not in his judicial capacity that he was connected with the police.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN said, he thought the Lord Advocate by his interruption had not attained the end which in a moment of hurry he had in view—namely, for throwing doubt on his argument. The Chief Constable in a Scotch county was selected by a Committee of the Commissioners of supply, who were not judicial persons. He would, however, pass from the counties to the boroughs of Scotland, where law and order was preserved, sometimes in the most trying circumstances and in the most admirable manner, by the police who were under an elective authority, not only such as they had in English boroughs, but such as they were now desirous of establishing in the counties. What great city was there in which they could imagine it more difficult to keep order than in Glasgow? And yet its police were most admirably managed by a purely elective Council. In addition to its great floating population, there was in Glasgow a large imported population from Ireland, belonging to the two conflicting parties in that country, but the police discharged their duties in a manner which was unsurpassed in any other part of the country, and they were under an elected authority which contained no Aldermen or selected Councillors. In his opinion, the more purely elective they made their authority the more they would bring on the side of the authority those moral forces which were the basis of law and order. He believed there was much less danger of favouritism and jobbery in an elective than in a nominated Body. Of all important concessions that could be made in the shape of self-government, almost the most important was the disposal of offices of responsibility and emolument, and he believed that this had, perhaps, as much to do with the question to which the noble Lord behind him had referred as any other part of the question. They were going to give Home Rule to counties, and were they to keep from them about the best and most important piece of patronage in the counties? In Northumberland, on the election of Chief Constable, after a committee of magistrates had carefully selected three candidates, a majority of the magistrates, from personal motives and under personal pressure, appointed a candidate who proved to be a most unsuitable person, and whose appointment was most unfortunate for the county. He did not believe that would have been done if the great influence now exercised in the county by his hon. Friend the Member for the Blackpool Division of Lancashire (Sir Matthew Ridley) had at the time been exercised as extensively as it was at that moment. But the thing was done, and he believed it always might be done in any nominated Body, and it was for the purpose of preventing such abuses, as well as for the purpose of separating administrative from judicial functions, that he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD said, he had no intention of intervening in the discussion, but thought it right to make a short statement with reference to the management of the police in Scotland. It was perfectly true that it was not in his judicial but in his administrative capacity that the Sheriff of a county in Scotland took charge of the police in its administrative work. He took that to be true of every magistrate, but it did not alter the fact that, as in England, a judicial officer was entrusted with the control of the police; and not only had the Sheriff control of the police in a county, but, if at any time disturbance arose in a borough, and he came on the spot and took the steps necessary to put an end to it by means of the borough police, the magistrates of the borough could not interfere with his orders and directions. He was the executive officer of the State, and the responsible administrative official to take charge of the police in that capacity in all cases. His right hon. Friend referred to the fact that in the boroughs the police were administered by elective Bodies, but he ventured to point out that in that respect the right hon. Gentleman was entirely mistaken. The police were not under the orders of the borough council, but under the orders of the magistrates, who were gentlemen elected and chosen by the Town Council as Aldermen were in England, but had to take the position of judicial officers as well.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD said, it was no accidental or verbal distinction which existed between the functions of the Sheriff as Judge and as the representative of the Crown in his county, and it was in the latter capacity only that he had certain authority over the police. The control of the police rested with a body of men who were in no sense a judicial body—namely, the Commissioners of Supply, who were qualified in virtue of certain property, and it was to a police committee, nominated by them, that the control of the police was entrusted, an arrangement which corresponded in all respects to the police in an English county. It was entirely a mistake to say that the control of the police was made dependent on judicial functionaries either in counties or boroughs.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said, he did not wish to refer either to Scotland or Ireland in the few observations he had to make on this subject. All he desired was to submit one or two practical considerations in connection with the Bill, which related solely to England and Wales. In that light it appeared to him that there was a good deal of force in the objection taken by the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Mr. Heneage) to the dual control of the police, and that being so there remained the choice between the County Councils on the one hand and the magistrates on the other. If they were to transfer the police to the County Councils, it would be acknowledged that that would be a very considerable change, and if it was to be made, the least hon. Members could do was to offer some serious reasons for making it. What reasons had been given in the whole of the discussion? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir George Trevelyan) had, by way of illustration, cited a certain case which he said occurred in Northumberland. He (Mr. Chaplin) was unable to speak on that subject from personal knowledge; but he believed it was a solitary instance, probably the only one which could be quoted. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no!] Then he hoped they would have other illustrations, because the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that there was less jobbery in elective Bodies in appointing to important offices than there was in nominated Bodies, and he was bound to say that, so far as he and the great majority of the Committee were concerned, that was totally opposed to their experience. Was it pretended that the administration of the police, as conducted by the magistrates in the past, was to be generally condemned? They had heard something from the hon. Member for Chester about the scandalous administration in the past, but he believed the hon. Gentleman stood alone in the assertion he made. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), last night, expressly repudiated the making of any charge against the magistrates, so far as their duties were performed, although he complained of the manner in which they were appointed; and that repudiation was re-affirmed that day by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. The right hon. Gentleman made some remarks in connection with the Game Laws; but he expressly guarded himself against making any imputation against the magistrates. That being so, he (Mr. Chaplin) was bound to come to the conclusion, which was a perfectly fair one, that up to the present time no good reason had been advanced for making any change in the system which by general, if not by universal, admission was acknowledged to have worked well up to the present time. Who was in future to be responsible for the administration of the law—the County Council or the magistrates? There was no question that for some time it must be the magistrates in whose hands the responsibility was to rest. Why, then, should they be deprived of the means of discharging the responsibility? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made a somewhat sweeping assertion when he said that the County Council ought not to be entrusted with every duty unless it was shown they were qualified to undertake them. But how were they to prove a negative? How were they to prove they were disqualified for duties until they had shown themselves unfit to perform them? He would rather put it in the other way—reversing the contention of the right hon. Gentleman—and say, “Give to the County Councils, and impose upon them every duty that you like, as soon as it is shown that they are qualified to perform them.” He was opposed to binding these new Councils with too many and too onerous duties until, at all events, they had had an opportunity of seeing how these bodies performed their duties. He hoped that when his right hon. Friend (Mr. Heneage) went to a Division, and he supposed that his right hon. Friend would go to a Division, they—on the Ministerial side of the House—accompanied by a great number of good Friends on the other side of the House, would go solid against the Amendment. Then, when the Amendment was rejected, it would remain to consider at a future time whether the control of the police was to be entrusted to the authority contemplated by the Government in the Bill, or whether it should be left, as in his opinion it ought to be, in the hands of the magistrates as at present.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, there were some on the Opposition side of the House who regarded this matter as inferior in importance to none in the Bill. He, for one, must express his surprise that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) was not in his place to take what he (Mr. James Stuart) regarded as the popular side, at any rate, upon this important matter. He listened with astonishment to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews), and to that of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald). He listened with astonishment to those speeches, because in them what the right hon. Gentleman seemed to argue in favour of, was the status quo in respect to the police. He was astonished that those two Gentlemen were prepared to support the proposal of the Government contained in this clause. If it was desirable to remove the police from the danger of popular control, which was really the essence of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, surely, then, the argument was that the police should remain as they were, and dead against the proposal of this Bill, which was to put the police under a joint committee of the two Bodies specified in the Bill. It ought to be borne in mind why the police were placed under the Quarter Sessions. If they looked through the country it would be seen that the police had, by the wisdom of Parliament, always been placed under the control of the Body most nearly representative of those among whom the police acted. In the boroughs they were put in the hands of the representative Body, and the boroughs were the only places where they had representative Bodies; in the counties, the nearest approach to a representative Body was the Quarter Sessions. In the case of London, they found that the very reason for not putting the police under the control of any Body short of Parliament was given by Sir Robert Peel at the time of the passing of the Metropolitan Police Act, and the reason given was this, that there was no representative Body in the Metropolis in whose hands the control of the Police Force could be placed. Now, why he and his hon. Friends argued that the police should be put in the hands of the Councils, was that Parliament was creating a representative Body in the counties where no representative Body had hitherto existed. If the Government followed, as nearly as they could, the conditions which had been laid down previously, they would place the police in the hands of the new Bodies. They need not go very far from their own doors to see the evils which arose when the police were entirely managed by some Body away from and outside the people. He asserted, without referring in detail to a matter which he would have to refer to again,—he meant the question of the London police—there was no place in England where the control of the police was more removed from the people than London, and there was no place in England where there was more dissatisfaction generally in connection with the police. He did not put that at the door of the police, but at the door of the method of their control. If they went over the water to Ireland, where they found nearly continual the conflict between the people and the police, the police were controlled from a great distance. It had been noticed by people coming to this country how ready the people were to assist the action of the law. People here assisted the action of the law because they knew the control over the execution of the law emanated, to a very great extent, from among themselves, much more, at any rate, than it did in other countries. Even as the police were now constituted, in the counties they were more under the control of the people than they were on the other side of the water. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary spoke as if a popularly elected Body would be subject to the whims of every passing impulse, and as if the Justices of the Peace or the Commissioners of the Police in London were Bodies of persons who, like the gods, were entirely free from the influence of human affairs. They needed to go no further than London to see that the controlling Bodies were certainly not altogether free from the pressure of certain prejudices, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether there were not as many instances of unelected Bodies, controlling the police in this country, being affected by passing events as there were of elected Bodies? Although a previous speaker had referred to some temporary difficulty at Cardiff, that was altogether exceptional. The borough police of this country had, as a whole, been well conducted and managed, and, as a whole, had been free from those influences which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary sought to attribute to the police in the counties if they were made subject to popular control. If the right hon. Gentleman feared popular control in that way, why did he introduce popular control in the Bill to the extent it was introduced? He (Mr. James Stuart) had abstained intentionally from entering into the question which affected Londoners more than any other body of persons—namely, the relation of the police in London to the people. He had done so because the question would come up again for discussion. He dealt with the matter on general grounds, and he repeated that there was no question which to him was of more importance, there was none which required more discussion, there was none on which he and his hon. Friends would criticize more closely the votes of those Liberals who sat upon the Opposition Benches, but who generally voted with the Government.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R. Holderness) said, he thought it was very unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment (Mr. Heneage) had coupled together two subjects, each of which seemed worthy of discussion. These subjects were the control of the police and the appointment of the Chief Constables. His sympathies were entirely with the right hon. Gentleman in the one; in the other they were entirely opposed to him. His right hon. Friend the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) in his speech just now, pointed out that no one had shown any reason to suppose that the County Councils would be capable of undertaking the duties proposed to be entrusted to them. But he would point out to his right hon. Friend that when they were constituting a new and great Body like the County Council there ought to be some strong reasons shown for withholding from them a duty so important as the duty of controlling the police. He held that the more power that was given to these assemblies, the greater would be the position they would occupy in the county. Nor did he believe there was any reason whatever to suppose that popularly elected Bodies had any sympathy at all with disorder. There were exceptional cases, no doubt, but he thought it could be shown that elected bodies generally did exercise with rigour the executive powers entrusted to them in the direction of suppressing disorder. He must say there was one difficulty which presented itself to his mind—it was one of those anomalies, however, which he supposed were frequently found in our system. The magistrates of a county were responsible for the peace of the county, and it certainly did seem an anomalous condition of things to deprive them of all power of keeping the peace. As a matter of fact, the same circumstances existed at present in the boroughs, and although it was an anomaly, it was one of those which had been found to work well. Therefore he supposed it might be equally applied to the counties. That was the only consideration which seemed to be against placing the control of the police in the hands of the County Councils, but he should not oppose the proposal on that account. He desired, however, to say a word in reference to the appointment of the Chief Constables. That appeared to be a matter of much greater importance. He did not believe the appointment of any high official could be satisfactorily made by any large body whatever, by the Quarter Sessions or the County Council. He had been informed by various people who were familiar with the working of Quarter Sessions that when the appointment of a Chief Constable came up it did happen that gentlemen who did not usually attend the Sessions turned up in considerable numbers. He did not think there was any reason to suppose that County Councils would be any freer than Quarter Sessions from this peculiar fallibility of human nature. Personally, he thought elected Bodies were much more likely to be swayed in that direction than Quarter Sessions; his belief was that Chief Constables ought to be appointed by some individual, be he the Lord Lieutenant or the Home Secretary, with the power of removal by address from the County Council; and he had a strong suspicion they would get better men in that way, and that there would be, by address from the County Council, a check upon the appointment of men who were not fit for the office. He was, under these circumstances, in some doubt as to the way he ought to vote. He had to weigh in his mind which was the more important feature of the case—the appointment of the Chief Constable or the control of the police. He was bound to say that, on the whole, the control of the police being placed under the County Councils was of more urgent importance than the appointment of the Chief Constable, and it would, therefore, be his unhappy fortune on this occasion to dissociate himself from very many of his hon. Friends.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he thought there was a little confusion in the debate arising from the mixing up of the administrative and the judicial control of the police. The Committee would see the essential difference if they would allow him to recall to their minds what was the position of the police both administratively and judicially in the boroughs of the Kingdom. He knew nothing about the law of Scotland, but he knew how the police were administered in the boroughs with large populations. The administrative control of the police in those boroughs was in the hands of a Watch Committee appointed by the Town Council of the borough, and if the contention of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was correct, that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) amounted to a divorce of the police from all judicial control, the greatest sinner in that respect would be the borough which the Home Secretary had the honour to represent, in which he ventured to say the police were as well and as efficiently managed as they were in any county in England. But in boroughs there was also judicial control of the police, the judicial control to which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary alluded when he went through all the various processes of issuing summonses controlling the action of the police with reference to the preservation of the peace, and that maintenance of law and order to which so many hon. Members had alluded. That was in the hands of the magistrates, and was not in the hands of Town Councils. If they went into the counties, they found the magistrates exercised a two-fold jurisdiction. As the magistrates are responsible for the maintenance of law and order, they controlled the police in the exercise of those functions to which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had alluded; but the administrative control of the county police was in the hands of the Police Committee of the county, which was appointed by the Quarter Sessions, and really he did not suppose for one moment that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) would contend that that was a judicial function at all. That was a purely administrative function which the magistrates had discharged with great efficiency and economy. The point, therefore, was not whether they were going to transfer what was judicial, but whether, when they were setting up in the county a popularly elected Body, who were to have control of the expenditure of the finances, they should not place that elected Body in precisely the same position in regard to the administrative control of the police as Town Councils were placed in the boroughs. Of course, they might argue from theory or from experience; they might argue that a nominated Body as magistrates were a better Body for exercising these functions than an elected Body; but the whole theory of the Bill was that it was desirable to transfer the administrative functions of nominated Bodies to the hands of elected Bodies; and the arguments which had been addressed to the Committee against elected Bodies applied not only to this clause, but to every other clause of the Bill. If they wanted to judge from experience they must take the experience of the large boroughs. He was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary raise some doubt about the administration of the police in large boroughs. Birmingham, Manchester, Leeds, Liverpool, had all larger populations than most of the counties; they had a larger number of police, and they had a more difficult population to deal with. They contained large numbers of the criminal classes, and they were subjected to what had been called popular gusts of feeling. Yet no one had ever complained that the administration of the police there had been ineffective or unsatisfactory, or that in any way the administration of law and order had been prejudiced by being placed in the hands of the elected representatives of those boroughs. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary alluded to the case of Torquay; he (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) intended to quote that as an illustration of his point. There the police were in no way interfered with by the elected

Body. The elected Body was the prosecuting Body in that case, and the police were perfectly independent. Speaking from his own experience in a Watch Committee, the police, in the discharge of their functions, in the preservation of Laws, were not interfered with by the Town Council. For all purposes of the maintenance of law and order the police were under the control of the magistrates. If any question arose the magistrates communicated with the Home Secretary, and if it was necessary action was taken through the magistrates. All that the supporters of this Amendment argued was that the administration and financial control of the police and the patronage of the police should follow the administration and financial control of all the other business of the county. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Holderness Division of York (Commander Bethell) referred to the question of the appointment of the Chief Constable. He (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) thought he could show to the Committee, if they could go through the various elections which had taken place, that the election of a Chief Constable in a large borough was not conducted on those principles of popular election which prevailed in counties. The appointment of a Chief Constable—say, at Birmingham, or any other large town—vested in the hands of the Watch Committee, which was a small Body. There had just been a Chief Constable elected in Staffordshire, and the election had aroused as much interest among the magistracy as a Parliamentary Election. Votes had been sought East and West, and North and South. He had no doubt the Quarter Sessions elected the very best man, but to say that there had been anything of a judicial character in the election proceedings was to caricature judicial functions. The principle which underlay the whole of this question was, were they prepared to maintain that constituents who were competent to elect men to sit in the House of Commons to control all the naval and military expenditure, and to control the policy of the Empire, were incapable of electing a Body of men in order to control financially the police force in the counties in which they lived. If popular election was worthy of the name, if popular government could be trusted to any extent, it surely could be trusted to the extent which the very small Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Heneage) proposed. He (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) trusted the Government would accept the Amendment, and that they would not maim the Representative Councils of the Counties by depriving them of functions which similarly elected Bodies in great towns had efficiently discharged for upwards of half a century.

MR. RITCHIE said, that what they all desired was that now they were constituting new county authorities they should make adequate provision for the maintenance of that force which had the preservation of law and order in its hands in a state of efficiency. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) had drawn an analogy from the case of towns, and had endeavoured to prove from that analogy that they would be perfectly safe in dealing with this question of the police in the counties in precisely the same manner as had been for a long time past done in towns. But he (Mr. Ritchie) had ventured once before in discussing this question to point out that, in the opinion of the Government, there was a very marked and wide difference between a borough and a county for purposes of this kind. He ventured again to press upon the Committee that there was that very real distinction, a distinction which made it essential that they should consider this question of counties altogether apart from the question of how the matter was arranged in the large towns for which the right hon. Gentleman was no doubt competent to speak. What was the position in large boroughs, at Birmingham, and Liverpool, and Wolverhampton? It was perfectly true that the administration of the police was in the hands of elected Bodies, but he was sure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) would acknowledge that the representation of individual interests in the borough he represented was very much more complete than it was possible for them to hope for in the case of the smaller areas over which the County Councils would have to exercise control. The Town Councils of the large boroughs consisted of a very large number of representatives; they were elected in considerable number from all parts of the borough, and they represented all sections of the community within the borough. A borough itself was a comparatively small area; although the population was large it was confined within a very limited space, and the condition of affairs in every part of the borough was within the knowledge of all the members of the council having to administer the police who had the care of law and order. But what was the condition of things in counties? They had a very large number of districts in the counties, some of them rural, some of them municipal boroughs, and if they were to follow out the analogy of the boroughs, the fit and proper system would be not to give the control of the police to the County Councils at all or to any Joint Committee, but to have a separate police force for all the various districts over which the District Councils which were to be created should have separate administrative control. But the right hon. Gentleman did not propose that, and no Member of the Committee had proposed it. What the right hon. Gentleman proposed was that the County Council—which was elected from a very large area, an area which contained many smaller areas often very widely scattered, and very often in no sense connected by interest or association—that they should give to the County Council which represented all the various places in the county the control of the police for the whole area of the county including both rural and urban districts. Now, in some counties the area was so large and the population was so great that the number of representatives which were to be retained in order to make a workable Council compelled them to limit very much indeed the number of representatives to be returned from the various areas, and many of these areas, some of them boroughs, some large urban districts, others rural districts, would only return one or two members. Now, under these circumstances, he did not think that it could be in any sense considered that the representatives of these districts or the ratepayers of these districts could have that complete control over the police force which the ratepayers of a borough had over their police force. That being so, and the county itself consisting of a very large area of very scattered population, and a very large number of districts, hardly any one of which had connection with the other, they considered that the Representative Council of that county was not in the same sense as qualified to efficiently represent all the various communities, as able to give that same kind of control over the police force as a Town Council of a borough was. These things considered, let him observe what, in the opinion of the Government, was the best means for providing for the adequate administration of the police force. They found that hitherto it had been entirely in the hands of the magistrates. They recognized at once that, having set up a great Representative Institution, they could not propose in the House of Commons that the representatives of the people duly elected were to have no control over the administration of the police force, but they considered that, having set up an entirely new Body under the circumstances he had named, it would not be wise to put the entire control of this force which was responsible for law and order throughout the great county area under the new Body. They, therefore, thought it was a perfectly justifiable proposal that along with this new Body they should associate the old body which had for so many years adequately performed its duties respecting the administration of police. He did not anticipate that there was at all likely to be any conflict whatever in connection with this matter. He knew that some of his hon. Friends thought that possibly there might be some conflict between the two component parts of the joint committee, but the Government did not think there would be anything of the kind. There were many joint committees at the present time, some of which had been mentioned before, where nothing like the conflict which had been spoken of arose, or was likely to arise. The sole and only desire of the Government had been, in handing over to the new Authority these large powers, to obtain efficiency. There had been no question whatever of suspicion on their part of the newly-elected Bodies. It would, indeed, be a sorry compliment to these great Bodies, which the Government, as their authors, would be naturally the last to pay, if they were to say that they had a suspicion as to the way in which they would exercise their authority. What they were seeking to obtain was a Body so composed as would in their opinion be the best for maintaining in efficiency the police force; and in associating the old and new Bodies for that object, they thought they had arrived at a solution of the difficulty which met exactly the requirements of the case, and which did not in any shape or form reflect the smallest discredit or suspicion upon the new Authorities.

MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire) said, he confessed he was unable to follow the arguments used by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) to show the difference between the new Councils as the representatives of the interests of the counties and the Watch Committees and Town Councils as the representatives of the interests of the boroughs. As he was unable to follow the course of the right hon. Gentleman's arguments, he did not intend to attempt any refutation of them. He hoped that the Government would carry out loyally their expressed intention of endeavouring to make the County Council as representative a Body as circumstances would allow, and, in his opinion, as far as it was representative it warranted the analogy which had been drawn between its functions and these of existing Town Councils. On the general question he did not know whether one ought not to sympathize with the Government in this matter, because they seemed to him to be anything but at one with their supporters. While the Government professed to be actuated by no distrust of the Bodies they proposed to set up, the speeches of their supporters behind them had breathed an entirely contrary spirit. The Committee were told by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Oswestry Division of Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) that an elected Body was not in favour of law and order. He (Mr. Bowen Rowlands) did not know in what quarter the hon. Gentleman had pursued his historical researches, but they must have been in quarters entirely misleading. If there was one charge more than another as to this matter which had been urged against republics and elected Bodies generally, it was that they had been too arbitrary in the exercise of the powers conferred upon them, and had put down with too strong a hand any attempted invasion of the rights and authority of which they believed themselves to be possessed. He saw in the present proposal of the Government a gloomy foreboding as to the way the Body which the Bill called into existence would exercise their functions. While the Government were prepared to confide lunatics, the most helpless part of the community, to the care and consideration of the County Councils, they considered that if they entrusted to them the administration of the police force they would be putting power into the hands of persons who knew not how to use it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had rebuked certain hon. Gentlemen who sat behind him in no uncertain tone. He had argued that it was impossible to prove a negative. He had argued that because there was no proof as yet to show that the new County Councils were fitted for the duties conferred upon them by the Bill, the control of the police should not be given to them. That was another example of the forebodings which they had heard uttered in dismal tones by some of those who had spoken from behind the Front Government Bench. If they pursued the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division to its logical conclusion they would give these County Councils no duties at all. They were not, according to the right hon. Gentleman, to be entrusted with duties until they had shown their fitness to discharge them; but that could not be shown until they had had duties to discharge. This language of the gloomy prophets contrasted very strongly and markedly with the language of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who looked with a cheerful countenance to a not far distant period, when all, or nearly all, the functions of county government, would be vested in these new Bodies. The noble Viscount the Member for the South Molton Division of Devon (Viscount Lymington) had referred to Ireland and Wales. He (Mr. Bowen Rowlands) did not think that the tithe riots in Wales was a very happy instance for the noble Viscount to select, because the tithe disturbances occurred at a place where the police were under the control of the county magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Matthews) had alluded to disturbances which had taken place in Cardiff. He (Mr. Bowen Rowlands) was unable to see how the case of the disturbances at Cardiff helped the argument of hon. Gentlemen opposite. At Cardiff an inquiry was held into the conduct of the police on a certain occasion. It was not for him to criticize the capacity of the tribunal which investigated the conduct of the police, nor to say anything in regard to its findings; but how an inquiry into the conduct of the police in a borough could assist the argument that the control of the police was not to be given to the County Councils, he was at a loss to understand, especially in view of those instances which were given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) showing how admirably the control worked in the larger towns and boroughs throughout the Kingdom. It was far from his intention to do anything to delay the Committee in arriving at a conclusion by a vote upon the question; but there were one or two other matters he wished to refer to. It was a curious fact, with regard to the control of the police by the authorities in boroughs and the authorities in counties, that in the disturbances which took place in Cardiff (and he believed it was also the case at Belfast) it was to the police who were imported from outside that the bulk of the disorders were mainly, if not altogether, attributed, and not to those who were under the control of the authorities within the borough. That was another instance which went to support the argument adduced on the Opposition side of the House; but among the gloomy pictures drawn on the other side, there was one bright spot shown by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). The hon. and gallant Baronet gave as a reason for the continuance of the present system that everybody in his district was desirous of being a magistrate; this might be true and might be an example of well or ill regulated ambition, but it proved nothing that could be of service in this discussion. The complaint they had to make in Wales was that magistrates were almost invariably selected from one class of people, and persons who were fairly entitled to a seat upon the Bench were denied the position by those who had the power of appointment. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had referred to the enforcement of the Game Laws by magistrates, and had appeared to confess that it was not all that could be desired. But his (Mr. Bowen Rowland's) and his hon. Friend's complaint was not by any means restricted to the hearing of cases under the same Laws, but rather as to the employment of police as additional gamekeepers. There was a Statute which prevented gamekeepers being constables, but the action of the magistrates really turned constables into gamekeepers. He was not there to make any special charge against the magistrates, although he was obliged to confess that their training and prejudices disposed them to run in one groove. On the grounds he had enumerated, he hoped the Committee would grant full control of the police to the County Council.

MR. STANSFELD said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had had, he thought, a difficult task, and he had not been perfectly successful in fulfilling it in endeavouring to justify the scheme of the Bill in regard to the control of the police, because the measure of the right hon. Gentleman was founded on the precedent of the Municipal Corporations Act, and everyone knew that in the Municipal Corporations the police were under the Town Council, and not under any mixed Committee or under any foreign Body. How did the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to justify and account for the proposal in his measure? As far as he (Mr. Stansfeld) could understand it, the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to draw a distinction between the boroughs and the counties with respect to the management of the police. He had said, in the first place, that if they were to go by analogy they ought to confer on District Councils the superintendence and management of the police; and he added that the County Councils were not as distinctly and as definitely representative Bodies as the District Councils were, or might be, in regard to the question of police. But what was his proposal? To give the superintendence of the police and the patronage of the police to a Body which was less representative than the County Council itself. There was no justification, it seemed to him (Mr. Stansfeld), for that argument. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the County Council was in some respects less fitted than the Council of a borough to undertake these functions: When the Municipal Corporations Act was passed, what experience had the Councils which were created for the first time under that Act? Besides, the County Councils of the future would be largely, and perhaps mainly, composed of the very men, or, at any rate, the class of men, from whom magistrates were chosen, and who had peculiar experience in the management of police. It was no use casting doubts on the Councils which they proposed to create for popular government in the counties, unless they could justify those doubts, and he asserted, without fear of contradiction, that the conditions of the case were such that the future County Councils would largely consist of county magistrates, and almost exclusively consist of owners of property and county gentlemen, from which classes of the community magistrates were chosen. Therefore, he maintained that on the ground of experience there was more reason for conferring on County Councils the administration of the police than there was reason when the Municipal Corporations Act was passed for conferring that power on the Councils which were thereby created. He wanted to give the Government to understand that they had come at length in this Bill upon what was a vital question, a question upon which they on the Opposition Benches felt deeply, and upon which their friends and constituents, and those who were politically in accord with them felt deeply; and he said this without fear or hesitation, that upon the conclusion to which the Committee came that day would depend largely the aspect in which the measure would be regarded by the people of the country, and that it would be impossible to avoid dissensions and political discussions, particularly with reference to that part of the measure. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) seemed to think that they (the Opposition) would find a difficulty in stating positively their reasons for objecting to the Government measures or to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) and of approving of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Heneage), which they were discussing at this moment. He (Mr. Stansfeld) felt no difficulty in stating the views and principles by which he believed they on that (the Opposition) side of the House were guided on this subject. First of all, they objected to the very thing which many people seemed to desire—they objected to mixing judicial with executive functions. They objected to too close and intimate an alliance between the Judges or magistrates and the police, and they adopted entirely the lucid and unanswerable explanation and arguments which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) had put forward so clearly, to the effect that what they desired was not to interfere with the judicial functions of the magistracy, or to take away from them any power which judicially they were entitled to exercise over the police in the county, but simply to place in the hands of a popularly elected Body, which was to pay for the police, the right of nominating and managing the police. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton had placed in his (Mr. Stansfeld's) hands the words of the Municipal Corporations Act which referred to this subject, and the thing was perfectly plain. The words were contained in the 91st section of the Act, and it was plain from that section that the powers conferred on the Watch Committees of Town Councils were purely administrative, and that the police remained absolutely at the disposal of the Justices, who were entitled to call upon them to act. In the 2nd subsection of that clause, he found that every constable should be liable to obey all such lawful commands as he might receive from any of the Justices having jurisdiction in the borough or in any county in which that constable was called on to act. Therefore, there was no difference at all between hon. Members on that and hon. Members on the other side on the question of the magistracy retaining all that power which might fairly be called judicial as distinct from the administrative power, and all that he claimed was that the measure, the principal object of which was to take away from the magistrates of counties that which was not judicial, but purely administrative, should follow that principle when they came to deal with the subject of the administration of the police. They on that (the Opposition) side of the House had another reason. They objected to the refusal to give the County Councils of the future that control over the police which the Borough Councils had, and which the Councils of Boroughs which were to be Counties were to have in the future. He thought it was a sorry compliment on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to pay to the County Councils, which he was instrumental in creating, to refuse them administrative powers which were vested in Town Councils by the Municipal Corporations Act. He (Mr. Stansfeld) ventured to think, or to suspect, that the right hon. Gentleman's feeling was not very strong against the arguments and the resolution which he (Mr. Stansfeld) was now advocating, and that it had been a matter of Party tactics and of concession to what might be called the Quarter Sessions element which had led the right hon. Gentleman to propose this compromise, which many even on the opposite side of the House did not think would work without difficulty and friction. But he (Mr. Stansfeld) should like the Committee to take a somewhat larger view of the matter, and would put it in this way. He contended that they could not do a more useful thing for law and order than to call upon the local representatives, freely chosen by the people, to administer the police, subject always to the right of the magistracy to call upon them when it might be necessary to do so. He had yet to learn the very A B C of Constitutional Government, if it was not a fact that if they wanted to rule the people with law and order, the people must be put on the side of law and order. Did not everyone know that looking back at the history of the Municipal Corporations of the country, how eminently successful the adoption in practice of that principle had been? There might have been occasions when there had been some difficulties to encounter, and when there had been some partial failure, but, looking at the question broadly and fairly, could anyone say to himself that any other measure or proposal or method could have conduced so much to the successful observance of law and order in the big boroughs of this country as the principles and arrangements of the Municipal Corporations Act, which placed the police under the administrative control of the Town Councils? Why, it was common sense and common knowledge that about the best thing they could do with men was to set them to a good work—was to define their duty and set them to do it. Under such circumstances most men would do their duty. If an elective Body of men were given the administration of the Bill whether they were a Borough Council or a County Council, however popularly they were chosen, they placed them at once upon the side of the law, and infused into their minds a high sense of responsibility. There had been many occasions in the history of the Municipal Corporations of this country when popular feeling was strongly against the exercise of police power, but the popularly elected representatives of the people in the Councils had not hesitated in the fulfilment of their duties, and had called upon the police to perform theirs. He said, therefore, that if they would do the best thing for law and order, they would place the police entirely under the control—subject to the right by law of the magistrates to call upon them to act in certain cases—entirely under the superintendence and control of the County Councils. What he had noted, he must say with some surprise, was that the objection to the present proposal had sprung from the other side of the House—from the supporters of the Government who had brought in this measure. He would put it to the Gentlemen who opposed this proposal to invest the County Councils of the future with the management of the police—he would put it to them on what ground did they support the proposal to create County Councils, if they could not trust them? These County Councils would undoubtedly consist to a large extent of gentlemen who were magistrates at the present time. They would further consist of persons coming mainly from the class from whom the magistrates were chosen. Was it for hon. Gentlemen opposite to cast discredit and a slur upon their own class, and upon their fitness for the fulfilment of their duties, and to take refuge in the argument of the President of the Local Government Board, when he said that those duties which the Borough Councils and their Watch Committees had conducted and fulfilled with admirable success for half a century, those who would compose the County Councils were not fitted to perform. These were the views and the principles which they (the Opposition) entertained. They held the strongest opinion upon the subject, and they would vote upon it that day with the strongest and deepest conviction, and they would never rest satisfied, even if it were carried against them now, until they had reform, and had invested the County Councils with the same rights in regard to the police as the Borough Councils possessed.

MR. SWETENHAM (Carnarvon, &c.) said, he had listened with admiration to the very eloquent and theoretical speech with which they had just been favoured by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld); but, with the permission of the Committee, he should like to recall it to a few dull, common-place facts. Now, let them just look for a moment at what was the proposal of the Government in this Bill. First, in regard to the position of the Chief Constable, it was proposed by the Bill that he should be retained, and that the power of appointing him should still rest with the County Magistrates; but before he dealt purely with the Amendment which they were now considering, he would draw the attention of the Committee for one moment to what the powers were which the magistrates had over the Chief Constable. They had power to appoint him, but they had not, to use the words of the Amendment, the power of controlling the Chief Constable. The Chief Constable, he apprehended, acted independently of the magistracy, nor did he think—and he spoke under correction if he was wrong—that they had the power of dismissing him, except indirectly, because, of course, they controlled the purse-strings. But the Amendment they had now under consideration went a great deal further, and proposed to give to the County Council much more power over the Chief Constable than the magistrates now had, because they not only proposed to give to the County Council his appointment, but the power of controlling him and dismissing him as well. He ventured, therefore, to think that the matter was one to which the Committee should devote very careful consideration before they decided in which way they ought to vote. Something had been said in regard to the magistrates, and in particular by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed). Well, he could not help thinking that, as a rule, the magistrates had performed their duty, so far, in a most exemplary manner. He could not help thinking himself that if attacks were made upon them from time to time, such as were recently made upon them by some Members on the other side of the House, and if these attacks were unjustifiable, he did not think the present wish to belong to the magistracy would long continue; but, on the other hand, he felt certain that if Lords Lieutenants of counties were to take care in appointing magistrates that they only chose the best men, men of culture and intelligence and position, and who had characters to lose, the magistracy would continue to enjoy the very high respect it had hitherto secured on the part of the community. He should further like to say this: he could hardly help thinking that it was a mistake to suppose that when gentlemen took upon themselves the office of magistrates, they did not put on one side, as the Judges did, all considerations of politics and all considerations of religion, and he thought that when they came to the decision of cases brought before them, they endeavoured to decide them as the Judges did, however they may have felt politically on certain subjects beforehand. Therefore, he was one of those who maintained that magistrates ought never to be selected on account of their religion or politics, but entirely on account of their intelligence and capacity. Now, let him say one word with regard to the appointment of the constables. He confessed, himself, he should have preferred to see both the appointment of the Chief Constable and of the other constables still kept in the hands of the magistrates, or given over to some Government Department — say, the Local Government Board; but it seemed to him the Bill proposed that there should be a joint committee, so far as the management was concerned. As a matter of course, he should vote for it; but he should draw attention to what he thought was an argument from which they could pretty well form an opinion as to how they ought to vote in this case. Suppose for one moment that a County Council, say, in the North of Wales, were to be composed—[Cries of "Divide!"] He would undertake not to trespass on the time of the Committee for more than a few moments; but perhaps the Committee would allow him to put this case. Suppose for a moment, what was not impossible, that in some of the counties of North Wales County Councils were composed largely of highly conscientious, excellent men, Nonconformist ministers who thought that the payment of tithe was wrong, and were entirely opposed to its payment. So long as tithe was payable, it was, of course, payable by law, and if the people would not pay when the law was set in motion, the police when called upon were bound to assist in carrying it out. Suppose the Chief Constable and the other constables were absolutely under the control and subject to the dismissal by a County Council such as that he had referred to, would it be in human nature either for the Chief Constable or the other constables to dare to act contrary to the wishes of those under whom they served—of those who had the control of their appointments and of their dismissal? Those appeared to him to be practical subjects which they ought to consider. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) had asked, rather triumphantly—"Are you going to distrust this body which you are now creating?" No; he did not distrust them; he would not distrust them any more than the right hon. Gentleman himself; but there were certain cases in which people ought not to be judges, and those cases were where their own interests were concerned. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he did not distrust the magistrates. No; but he would distrust them just as much as anyone else, where they were made judges in their own cases. Certainly, with all admiration for the way in which magistrates had fulfilled their duties, if he had had the power to stop them, he never would have allowed them to be judges in game cases. As he objected to the magistrates being judges in their own cases, so he objected to the police, whether the Chief Constable or the other constables, being put under the control or power of the County Councils, against some members of which they might from time to time be called upon to act. He would detain the Committee no further. He was obliged to them for having listened to his remarks, and he could not help feeling that they ought thoroughly to consider the proposal in the Amendment before they agreed to it.

MR. HENEAGE said, he hoped they might now be allowed to divide after a debate which had lasted two hours and a-half.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, the next Amendment was in his name, to strike out from the fourth Sub-section the words—

“Subject as to the use of buildings by the Quarter Sessions and the Justices to the provisions of this Act respecting the Joint Committee of Quarter Sessions and County Councils.”

The clause proposed to give to County Councils certain powers. It transferred to the Councils administrative business at present transacted by the Quarter Sessions in respect of certain matters. Sub-section 4 provided for the transfer to the County Council of the powers of Quarter Sessions with regard to shire halls, county halls, Assize Courts, Judges' lodgings, lock-up houses, Court houses, Justices' rooms, police stations and county buildings, works and property, but this power was subject to their use by the Quarter Sessions under other provisions of the Bill respecting Joint Committees of Quarter Sessions and County Councils. He brought forward the Amendment because he had a strong objection to the principle of dual control by the joint committee which it was proposed to establish, consisting partly of the Justices of the Peace and partly of the County Councils; and just as the principle of the control of the police by such joint committee was open to very grave objection, so he thought that the same dual control as applied to the question of shire halls, county halls, Assize Courts, Judges' lodgings, and so on, was liable to friction and very great abuse. It would be said, no doubt, by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, that as these matters related to the administration of justice, therefore it was desirable that the magistrates should have something to say as to the use of these buildings. Well, he took the position himself in the first place, that to retain the existing magistrates as a judicial Body was a mistake, and that they ought to be abolished altogether; but that, of course, he was not going to argue at the present time. Another principle upon which he went, in opposing the dual control intended to be set up, so far as regarded the matters specified in this sub-clause, was that, as these buildings and so forth had to be maintained out of the rates, and as the people were to be taxed for the purpose of providing such rates, it was only proper that their elected representatives should have control over these specified buildings and other places. It was a fundamental principle that was known in the constitution of this country that there should be no taxation without representation, and if it was argued that the magistrates were entitled to share this control, his answer would be that the magistrates, having the opportunity of being elected on the County Councils—an opportunity which they were pretty certain to exercise to the fullest extent, because they would have better opportunities of becoming elected, in all probability than other persons, because they would have greater advantages under municipal nominations under this Bill—would have all the control over these buildings as members of the Councils, either nominated or elected, which they could desire. In view of the great difficulties that would arise, and, in view of the great objections that might exist on many grounds to this principle of dual control by joint committees, he thought that it was undesirable that these buildings and other arrangements should be left under the control of any such joint committee. The principle they went upon was that those who had to pay for these things should be unfettered in their control and use, and that, if the Justices of the Peace wanted the use of those buildings for particular purposes at particular seasons, they should apply to the Councils for permission to use them. Under the clause as it stood, what would happen would be this: county buildings would be entirely under the control of an unrepresentative section of the Councils and unrepresentative magistrates, because it would hardly be denied that the joint committee would, in all probability, consist almost exclusively of the magistrates who had not been, and would not be, the elected members of the Councils. Now, that being so, he thought it would be very hard indeed on the majority of the people in any county that the buildings they had put up there, and which had to be maintained by a rate paid by them, should be entirely and exclusively under the control of those who did not directly represent them. He thought there could be no doubt as to what would be the result. That would happen which was happening to-day in many parts of the country, especially in country districts, at political meetings—

namely, that they who represented the party opposite to the parson and the squire were excluded from the only room in villages in which they could possibly hold meetings—that was to say, in the village school-room. That was a great grievance, and just as they felt it to be a grievance in that small matter, so he apprehended the ratepayers would find it a grievance to be excluded from their own buildings through the prejudices of the unrepresentative members of the Council who would constitute one part of the joint committee. It was in order to obviate such difficulties as those, which it was pretty sure were likely to arise, and, in order to insist upon the great principle that the people had a right to control their own buildings and works and property, that he ventured on this sub-section to enter the strongest protest against the dual control mentioned in this sub-section, and that he ventured to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 18, to leave out from “subject” to end of paragraph (IV.).—(Mr. Conybeare.)

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Long) (Wilts, Devizes) said, he did not know whether the hon. Member seriously contemplated the acceptance by the Committee of this Amendment. He (Mr. Long) could assure the Committee that there need be no apprehension of that which the hon. Member referred to—namely, unfair execution of these duties by the joint committees. The only object of the sub-section was to enable the joint committee of the Quarter Sessions and the County Councils to have the use of the buildings mentioned so far as they might be required by either of those Bodies. The Quarter Sessions would have to make use of those buildings for several purposes.

Mr. PION (Leicester) said, that surely the representatives of the ratepayers ought to be supreme in managing the property of the ratepayers. The representatives of the ratepayers were the County Council, and the joint committees would be by no means representative. He did not think that it was in the slightest degree probable that the representatives of the ratepayers would be unreasonable people, and it was in the highest degree likely that they would always allow such use of the county property as was requisite for the carrying out of the law. He thought it was in the highest degree unlikely that any difficulty would arise through the carrying of this Amendment, and he considered it most desirable that the County Council should be supreme on this subject, and should have complete control over the property of the ratepayers.

It being ten minutes to Seven of the Clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

NORTHSEA FISHERIES BILL—[BILL 278.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Baron Henry de Worms.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, it really seemed to him unseemly at such an hour as this to attempt to make progress with an important Bill of this character. It would be improper to proceed with a Bill even smaller than this; indeed, he should think it would be impossible to push any measure through at such an hour. He supposed the hon. Member who had the Bill in charge, like other hon. Members, was at this time of the evening rather hungry and waiting for his dinner, and he (Dr. Tanner) should think that the five minutes time which was all that was left for hon. Members to discuss matters of public interest would be a great deal better employed in the fulfilment of one's natural functions, which not even hon. Gentlemen opposite could ignore, than trying to run through measures in this manner. He sincerely hoped that further discussion on the Bill would be deferred until a more seemly opportunity.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire) said, he would appeal to the hon.

Gentleman to withdraw his objection. The present Bill was not only an innocent one, but one which would be of the greatest benefit to the North Sea fishermen; therefore, he trusted the hon. Gentleman would allow it to pass this stage. The Bill was founded upon a Convention agreed to by all European nations bounding on the North Sea.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said, he would add his appeal to that of the right hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks). This Bill was one of the best which had been brought in this Session. It was one for total prohibition on the sea. It only remained for Her Majesty's Government to bring in a measure to carry out total prohibition on the land, and their legislation upon the subject of the liquor traffic would be perfect.

DR. TANNER said, he did not care much for appeals which were made to him from the other side of the House. Her Majesty's Government and hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side invariably obstructed Irish measures when they were brought forward; and he, therefore, felt in duty bound, when Ministerial measures were brought forward, to try and get them discussed in an adequate fashion. He was always anxious to prevent the misuse on the part of the Government of the privileges the House conferred upon them. Seeing that the Bill was of the character described by hon. Gentlemen who had spoken from those (the Opposition) Benches, he would not proceed with his objection. If he refrained from offering opposition, however, it was not because of any love he bore the other side. He should not persist in his objection out of compliment to Gentlemen on his own side with whom he was proud to be associated.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he wished to state to the House that in accordance with the statement he had made yesterday, he should ask the House to go into Committee of Supply on Thursday next, and that Vote 12 of the Army Estimates would be proposed and some Votes on the Navy Estimates.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Will not Votes on the Civil Service be taken?

MR. W. H. SMITH: No; no Civil Service Votes will be taken.

DR. TANNER: Will the Navy Estimates be taken in order?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Not in regular order.

MR. STANSFELD: Will the Local Government Bill be the first Order on Monday?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes; or if not, only some remaining stages of minor measures will be taken.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WAYS AND MEANS.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

EAST INDIA (MR. WILLIAM TAYLER).

RESOLUTION.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.), in rising to call attention to the case of Mr. William Tayler, late Commissioner of Patna; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable, with a view to the settlement of a long-standing controversy as to the wrong stated to have been suffered by a meritorious servant of the Crown, that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into this case," said, he entreated the House not to turn away from the cry of a meritorious servant of the Crown because his was "a tale of ancient wrong," and because he was 81 years of age, and his wrongs had their origin 31 years ago. The longer cruel hardships had remained unredressed the greater was the urgency for redress. The story which he had to tell was of a man who, placed in a position of the highest responsibility, and in circumstances of appalling difficulty and danger, did his duty to the best of his abilities, and saved a great Province from the horrors of the Mutiny. That man was, unfortunately, misunderstood, and cruelly wronged by his superior officer, and for 30 years since then he had devoted all his energies to the task of rehabilitating himself before the world. He now appealed to the Commons of England for the redress which that House never refused in a deserving case. Close upon 60 years ago William Tayler landed in India as a young cadet in the Company's employment. He served for nearly 30 years with success and distinction in every grade of the Bengal Civil Service, and at length reached the topmost step but one of the official ladder, and became Commissioner, or Chief Ruler, of the populous Province of Patna or Western Behar. The Commissioner of Patna, as an administrative Chief, was subordinate only to the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal at Calcutta, who, in his turn, was subordinate only to the Governor General and the Supreme Government of India. That was the position held by Mr. Tayler at the moment when the awful wave of the great Mutiny in 1857 swept over Northern India and surged up to and around the Province of Patna. How he faced this appalling situation was matter of history. Unfortunately, his views and those of his superior, Sir Frederick Halliday, Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, were directly and openly at variance, both as to the nature of the crisis and as to the means by which it should be met. Sir Frederick Halliday had before this proposed to remove Mr. Tayler. Four hundred miles away, in the security of Calcutta, he thought that Patna was safe; that the revolt of the neighbouring Sepoys at the Patna Cantonments of Dinapore was inconceivable; that the Wahabee Mahomedans of Patna were "innocent and inoffensive," and so forth; he considered all Tayler's measures utterly wrong, and one, whereby the Christians at Gya and Tirhoot were warned to concentrate on the central station of Patna, he stigmatized as done under a panic. The upshot was that while Sir Frederick Halliday was brought home to the high places of the Secretary of State's Council—from which he had only retired a few months ago—Mr. Tayler was virtually dismissed from his high office, a ruined and broken man. The sentence of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal was confirmed by Lord Canning and the Government of India, who, in such a case, would be little else than the Lieutenant Governor under another name; and while the facts of the Mutiny were only obscurely known, the crushing sentence was further endorsed by the Board of Control, though some of the most serious parts of the charge were there withdrawn. He (Sir Roper Lethbridge) would not attempt to pass judgment himself on these remote events, or on the actions of Mr. Tayler in the Behar crisis; but he should refer to the testimony of every recognized authority and every competent witness. He would first show that at least two out of the five Members of Lord Canning's Government who had concurred in the dismissal on the imperfect evidence entirely changed their opinion on fuller information, and after the Wahabee trials of 1865. One of the chief charges brought against Mr. Tayler was that he had been unduly severe against the Wahabee fanatics, whom Sir Frederick Halliday called "inoffensive men, against whom there was no ground of suspicion." And it was suggested that Mr. Tayler had been misled by the intrigues of his own subordinates. But some years later these very Wahabees were tried by Sir Herbert Edwardes on other charges of treason, convicted, and sentenced to death, and Mr. Tayler's subordinates, who had been dubbed intriguers, were decorated with the Star of India. Writing to Mr. Tayler, Sir Herbert Edwardes said—

"The centre of the truly bitter and formidable conspiracy was Patna. You lived there and knew what was going on. You acted on your knowledge, and paralyzed the whole of the Wahabee sect, by seizing their leaders at the very moment when they could and would have struck a heavy blow against us. The Bengal Government were determined not to believe in the Wahabee conspiracy, and punished you for your vigour. Time has done you justice, shown that you were right, and hanged or transported the enemies whom you suspected and disarmed."

Sir Bartle Frere wrote that it "had been proved beyond all doubt" that Mr. Tayler saved the Province from insurrection. He turned from the evidence of Members of the Government—two of whom voluntarily came forward afterwards and testified that, had the facts been known to them, they would not have joined in the censure passed on Mr. Tayler—to the opinions of every historian and every writer who had written upon the terrible times in India during the great Sepoy Mutiny. Their authority would not be impugned by Her Majesty's Government. They were Sir John Kaye, Colonel Malleeson, and Dr. Alexander Duff. They had all given precisely the same verdict with respect to the treatment of Mr. Tayler by the Government, and they showed the greatest anxiety, as being honest men they were bound to do, that he should obtain redress of his injuries. Dr. Alexander Duff was the head of the Scottish missionaries in Bengal, and his name was a household word over the Province, and he was known as a most estimable character when he (Sir Roper Lethbridge) was in Bengal; and he wrote that, under Providence, Mr. Tayler was the protector of Patna and the saviour of Behar, and for a single error of judgment he was removed from his exalted station, in which he had rendered momentous service to India and the British Crown; and Dr. Duff added that the real ground obviously was the antagonism between Mr. Tayler's policy and the policy of the Government in dealing with the events of the crisis. A precisely similar verdict was given by others—by Victoria Cross heroes, like his old friend Mr. Fraser Macdonald and Mr. Ross Mangles. The latter wrote—

"I can bear my humble testimony to the vigorous and judicious measures which you adopted at Patna, and which, beyond question, saved that city. I have always been surprised that your services have never been recognized, but I hope that justice may yet be done to you."

These words were written 20 years ago. Take the evidence, again, of gallant Boyle, the engineer who planned the defence of the little Arrah Compound. He wrote—

"I am glad to repeat what was then the general conviction, since confirmed by facts—that had you not acted as you did on your own responsibility (disregarding for a time routine and needless technicality)"—this was the sting of the whole thing—"Patna could not have been saved. That you were the means of saving Patna and the lives of the Christian community there is as undeniable as that less far-seeing policy would have involved a widespread catastrophe. When I consider these things, how you have been treated for your eminent services while Commissioner of Patna, how you have been wronged, how you were degraded instead of being honoured, and how even yet neglect and injustice are unredressed,"

Sir Vincent Eyre endorsed all that had been written by Sir John Kaye and Colonel Malleeson, who rejoiced that in Mr. Tayler they had the right man in the right place, who had the courage to assume responsibility adequate to the occasion. It was because Mr. Tayler had that courage and assumed that responsibility that he had been disgraced and degraded these long years. He should only trouble the House with one extract more on the subject, and it was from the gallant Colonel Rattray, of Rattray's Sikhs, who happened to have lived in the same house with Mr. Tayler. He said—

"No one but those who were working with Mr. Tayler, living in his house as I was, can know the amount of burden thrown upon him, and all that I can say is not once did I see a symptom of panic during the whole of the time I was working with him. Always courteous, always affable, always cool, and always approachable, he was the picture of what an English gentleman should be when placed in a most critical and dangerous position, and I maintain through thick and thin that it is mainly due to him that Patna was saved. I sincerely trust that Mr. Tayler may yet live to see full justice meted out to him."

This testimony was given 10 years ago. He (Sir Roper Lethbridge) might quote precisely similar language from the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Patna, the Church of England Chaplain of Patna, the German missionary there, round robins of English residents, round robins of Natives, surgeons, engineers, all sorts and conditions of men; and he challenged a single contradictory statement from those who were there to say that Mr. Tayler's policy was wrong. He did not think that anyone would deny that there had been all along an overwhelming consensus of opinion, especially in India, that a grave error was committed by the Government in this case; and what he feared was that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) might be tempted to say that the matter had been decided on its merits, and that the Government could not re-open the case. He held in his hand absolutely undeniable proof that the matter had never been decided on its merits since the time when, in 1865, the new facts were discovered, and the Members of the Government of India themselves altered their opinions. The letter which he was about to read was the keystone of his case. It was an autograph letter of that noble-minded statesman, the late Sir Stafford Northcote. It was written on India Office paper, and the signature had been verified by his hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir Stafford Northcote). The Under Secretary of State for India had informed him, in reply to a Question, that there was no trace whatever to be found of this letter in the India Office. The letter was as follows:—

“Harley Street, December 7, 1868. My dear Sir,—Your appeal has not yet, as I find, gone before the Committee of our Council, by whom it will have to be dealt with. I take for granted that when it comes on for discussion, Sir Frederick Halliday will abstain from taking part in the deliberation of the Council; and I feel assured that the Duke of Argyll will look into the question ‘fairly and fully.’ I remain, yours very faithfully, STAFFORD NORTHCOTE.”

What next did they find? The Government to which the late Sir Stafford Northcote belonged went out of Office. With regard to what happened, The Times—which did not usually use unmeasured language—called it “a sinister fact.” His hon. Friend (Sir John Gorst) spoke of it as “an accident that may happen in the best-regulated Departments.” For 10 long years Mr. Tayler waited for the orders on his Memorial that was to be “fairly and fully” looked into, and then he discovered, from a statement in The Scotsman, and not by information from the India Office, that his papers, including the Memorial, had gone, vanished, no one knew when, no one knew whither, and that the Duke of Argyll, as Secretary of State, had recorded this most significant Minute—“My opinion is against re-opening the case.” The House would observe that this was not against Mr. Tayler on the merits of the case, not against the merciful inclinations of his Predecessor, Sir Stafford Northcote, but against any consideration of those merits. He protested at once, and most strongly, against the attempt that had been made to throw the blame for the miscarriage of justice on the Duke of Argyll. He held that the opinion of the Duke was a just and proper one, probably even a necessary one, for he had not been made aware of the promise and intention of Sir Stafford Northcote, and could only conclude that in re-opening the case he would be casting a slur on the judgment of his Predecessor. The words of the Duke, after the promise of Sir Stafford Northcote, could not possibly be got over. They declared definitely that the case had not been re-opened, and they cast palpably and incontestably on his hon. Friend the responsibility of refusing to do an act of justice. Why, it might be asked, was the present year so especially favourable for the reconsideration of this matter? He had some little delicacy in replying very directly to that question, though the answer was well known to everyone who had followed the case. It was his determination, and that of those who acted with him, not to say one word of imputation against the two most distinguished and most eminent Members of the Secretary of State's Council, Sir Frederick Halliday and Sir Henry Maine, who for a great many years thought it their duty strongly to oppose Mr. Tayler, and who both, within the last few months, had been removed from that Council, one by death and one by resignation. Hard words enough had passed on both sides. He would earnestly say let bygones be bygones; and in extenuation of any bitter words that might be raked up against Mr. Tayler, he would urge that when charges on public grounds were brought against a man and were known by him to be false it was only human nature to assign some of the animus to private grounds. And if Sir Henry Maine were alive he would be the first to laugh at the original cause of quarrel between him and Mr. Tayler. The quarrel was over the famous Simla “pickles case,” when the late Sir William Mansfield accused his secretary, Captain Jervis, of stealing his pickles. Simla society was rent asunder into fiercely contending factions by the case. Sir Henry Maine, as Law Member of Council, was, in a way, the Legal Adviser of the Commander-in-Chief. Mr. Tayler was the advocate of the secretary, and triumphantly won his case. But surely those old feuds of bygone times might now be forgotten. It remained an obvious practical fact that, whereas for at least 20 years it had been impossible for a Secretary of State to do anything for Mr. Tayler without offering something like a rebuff to his two most distinguished Councillors, now nothing of the kind was involved. He might say that the whole Press of India and a most influential portion of the Press of England had dwelt on that fact.

Sir Roper Lethbridge

Within the last few months everyone of the great newspapers of India had called on the Secretary of State to move in the matter, and had declared that justice could now be done without hurting the dignity or the character of anyone, and with great advantage to the character of the Government. The Times the other day said of Mr. Tayler that—

“The time that is left to him in the ordinary course of nature cannot be long. It will be our loss rather than his if the future historian has to record that he went down to the grave with all who knew his deeds applauding them, and officialism alone holding stupidly, unjustly, and dishonestly aloof.”

It was official, not national, ingratitude; and The Calcutta Englishman, passionately applauding this sentiment, added that—

“Every right-hearted Englishman must hope that his children and grandchildren will have cause to be thankful that he worked for their honour during the 30 years of his retirement undeterred by official slights or by unmanly doubts of his eventual success.”

Everyone who knew the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary and the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cross) would feel that they, at least, were the last men in the world not to join heartily in such a wish. But he must sorrowfully confess that it was possible that his hon. Friend, after all he (Sir Roper Lethbridge) had ventured to urge, and after all that would be urged by those who would follow him, might still feel a dread of some reproach for committing what had been represented to him as a breach of official etiquette. He ventured to assure him—and the generous heart of the people of this country would assure him—that when that official sin came to be recorded against him, the Recording Angel would remember the poor old hero of Patna and his wrongs, and would drop a tear on the record and blot it out for ever. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN S.E. (Durham) said, he rose with the greatest pleasure to second the Resolution, and if he might be permitted to offer a reason for doing so, it was because he was to have had the honour of seconding the Motion of Sir Eardley Wilmot on this subject when the case was about to be brought forward in 1878. Since that time, owing to changes of Governments, changes in Ministries and other accidental circumstances the case had not been brought forward, and there had been no investigation whatsoever of this question. They had been told time after time that the case, having been investigated by successive Secretaries of State, had passed beyond the cognizance of the present day. He should elaborate that point in the course of his observations to show that, except in the first interval, no investigation of any description whatsoever had been held. If he might be allowed to offer an apology for intervening in this debate, it would be that he had the honour of having been himself engaged in the transactions to which the Motion of the hon. Member related at the time at which they occurred, and he hoped that the personal testimony of one who had been engaged in the circumstances he was endeavouring to relate would, however junior his position might be, continue to be regarded as of some value in that House. In 1857, when these events occurred, the Province of Bahar and the City of Patna were saved from destruction, and from a loss of life such as they were not able to estimate by the bold, determined, wise, and well-conducted action of Mr. Commissioner Tayler. The Mutiny which broke out in India in 1857 had overwhelmed nearly the whole of the country, and in a few isolated spots there were detached sections of our countrymen exposed to dangers to which he sincerely hoped none would ever be exposed again. In such circumstances as those, Mr. Commissioner Tayler, then in the prime of life—now an old man of 81 years—and having had an official experience of 26 years in India—during which he had obtained the distinguished approbation of everyone under whom he had served—had to meet a most perilous crisis with scarcely any assistance from those with whom he was associated, that which he did receive being in many cases a detriment and a block to him. He rose to the emergency; but he committed the unpardonable fault of having been right when his official superiors were wrong, and the vindictiveness and narrow-minded spite which wrecked his career and had followed him ever since was attributable to nothing but that he, being a most clear-sighted and capable Englishman, had met with the censure of those who were less clear-sighted and capable than himself. The great City of Patna, close to the military station of Dinapore, containing great Government factories, and millions of treasure, was left with scarcely any garrison at all, which might be said to consist of Commissioner Tayler himself and a few police when the emergency arose. In the month of June, 1857, Commissioner Tayler knew from previous investigation what was not understood by the authorities at Calcutta—of the existence of a great and powerful conspiracy aimed at uprooting the foundation of our power in India—concerning which everything that he then alleged was, seven years afterwards, borne out by unimpeachable evidence beyond the possibility of doubt. He had to deal with the circumstance that eight miles lower down the Ganges than Patna there was a garrison of three of the best regiments of our Indian Army, who were held in check by one regiment in which he (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) had the honour to serve. Their efficiency could not be doubted from a military point of view; but for that very reason they were all the more dangerous should they become our enemies. Commissioner Tayler was urging on the authorities the existence of the conspiracy, and the necessity of disarmament. The insurrection was spreading all over the country, and our out-stations were being overwhelmed, owing to their small numbers, when Commissioner Tayler thought that it would be a prudent step to disarm these 2,000 Indian troops, for which proceeding there were means at hand, and an opportunity afforded. The only opposition offered was that of Sir Frederick Halliday and General Lloyd, who desired to retain a belief in the loyalty of the Native troops with whom he had been associated all his life, although in the course he took he was afterwards proved to have been grievously mistaken, and which course was absolutely opposed to the information of Commissioner Tayler. At Patna itself he nipped the insurrection in the bud by seizing somewhat unceremoniously—insurrections were not to be put down with rose water—the Wahabee leaders without further detriment to themselves, except that they were deprived of the power of doing mischief. That raised the ire of Sir Frederick Halliday, then Governor of Bengal, whose influence was strong enough to induce Lord Canning and General Lloyd to resist every representation made to them as to the disarmament of the forces, which might, in the early days of the conspiracy, have been deprived of the power of doing evil. Subsequent events had undoubtedly proved that in every step taken by Commissioner Tayler he was right, and that the steps taken by his official superiors, who were opposed to him, were absolutely and lamentably wrong. He (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) would show presently how that bore on the insurrection in India, and how, without the intervention of Providence, Lucknow—to whose relief his father was advancing—would have fallen, in consequence of this neglect of Mr. Tayler's advice. This disarmament of the Native troops might easily have taken place early in June, and when at last permission was given the operation was so mismanaged and bungled that a large force of somewhat over 2,000 trained Sepoys—as fine soldiers as any in the world—were able to escape into the adjoining Province of Behar, with the whole of their ammunition in their possession, which enabled them for 15 months to oppose resistance to the attempt to suppress the Mutiny. But the chief point alleged against Mr. Commissioner Tayler was that he showed a want of courage in what was called the disgraceful withdrawal of the officials from the districts. What did that mean? All over India small detached bodies of Europeans were striving for their lives. In the midst of the circumstances that surrounded them they would naturally retire to the nearest town; and the whole gravamen of the charge against Mr. Tayler was that he foresaw the possibility of those small detached parties being obliged to take refuge in Patna, and gave facilities for that which all over India was taking place without any orders at all. Another charge against him was that he had prevented the advance of the heroic Sir Vincent Eyre to the relief of Arrah. When the authorities had succeeded in bungling the plan of disarmament, the 2,000 Sepoys, who made their escape with their arms and ammunition, laid siege to the small house at Arrah to which the hon. Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge) had alluded. A detachment of European soldiers, 400 in number, who were sent to their relief, had fallen into an ambush; they suffered severely, and had to return diminished in number by 250. The allegation against Commissioner Tayler was that when some few days later a much smaller detachment of British soldiers, available for the relief of the beleaguered garrison, was passing up the river, he recommended them to proceed with caution. If he had not done that, he would have been deficient in respect of the first element of his public duty. Seeing what had happened to a much superior force a few days before Commissioner Tayler—whose business, as a Civil officer, it was to sift all the evidence derived from a hundred sources as to what the probability of success might be—sent through the military officer commanding at Dinapore, who had to decide whether the movement should be made or not, certain advice either not to advance, or else to advance with caution to what, in his opinion, might otherwise be almost certain defeat. So far from that being in any degree a discredit to Mr. Tayler, he (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) maintained that it reflected the highest possible credit upon his foresight and his appreciation of the duties which fell to his share as Civil officer, in giving all the information in his power to the Military Authorities. These were the only two points alleged against this man. He would not say, in general terms, that there had been official rancour displayed against Mr. Tayler, as he (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) did not believe that such a feeling was entertained by the higher officials, the case having received a fair hearing whenever it had come up for higher consideration, and Mr. Taylor having been especially completely exonerated by the Court of Directors. But one individual had, from first to last, displayed implacable hostility against Commissioner Tayler, because that gentleman had been right, whilst he himself, his official superior, had been wrong, and these two insignificant reasons had been picked out as a lever for bringing to an end the official career and ruining the prospects and embittering the life of a gentleman to whom the people of India, perhaps, owed as much as to any other man engaged in the Mutiny. He was not aware that there was anything further alleged against him; but if Mr. Tayler had committed an error of judgment in this matter, what did it amount to? It amounted to a case of this kind—that in extinguishing a great and dangerous conflagration, which threatened life and property, those who managed the fire-engine might have accidentally sprinkled the bystanders. Now, let him (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) point out that subsequent events, in every respect, had confirmed the soundness of the judgment arrived at by Mr. Taylor. It was at that time urged on Lord Canning, who had not then been long in India—and of whom he wished to speak with every respect, he having, of course, been in this matter in the hands of his official advisers—who had long years of Indian experience—that Commissioner Tayler had, without due cause, seized and imprisoned some worthy and inoffensive Mahomedan gentlemen—these being the Wahabee conspirators. If that conspiracy had not been promptly checked much bloodshed and slaughter would have resulted. But what happened later on? In 1864, after Commissioner Tayler had been displaced and relegated to private life, when everything had been done that was possible to ruin him, when he had been deprived of pay and pension, and forced to rely upon his own extraordinary talents as an advocate for a subsistence, this remarkable event occurred. An investigation which was carried on by Sir Herbert Edwards at Simla, in the North-West Provinces, in connection with the Wahabee conspiracy, brought to light the fact that the very individuals whom Commissioner Tayler had seized—thus nipping the insurrection in the bud—were the persons who were subsequently proved to be the principal movers in the insurrectionary movement in 1857, which was intended to upset the British power in India. Those men were convicted in 1864, on the clearest evidence; but Commissioner Tayler was, unfortunately, unable to profit by what happened. But the men who were instrumental in proving that the Wahabees seized by Commissioner Tayler were connected with the conspiracy were, by the deliberate action of the Indian Government, promoted for the services they had rendered the country. From that day up to the present, every subsequent event had fully and completely established the soundness and correctness of Mr. Taylor's judgment. Speaking from personal knowledge in this matter, he could say that the escape of the Dinapore brigade from Dinapore into the jungle, with all their arms and ammunition complete, might have had, except for the interposition of Providence, a fatal effect on the result of the insurrection in India. At that time the force under his father's command, and of which he (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) had the honour to be executive officer, was on the further—the northern—side of the Ganges, having fought 11 battles on the near side, capturing 100 pieces of artillery, and being then within 50 miles of the relief of Lucknow. As far as he and his father knew every hour was of importance. What happened? In consequence of Mr. Tayler's advice not being followed, and this large body of men being allowed to escape intact to swell the forces of rebellion, the whole of his father's movements were absolutely checked. He asked the permission of the House to read a few words from a letter of his father, expressing the judgment which, with great regret, he had arrived at on this occasion. He was not quoting from a copy of a document, but from the original, written by himself at that time to his father's dictation, in the warmth of the circumstances as they occurred, and he would then ask whether Commissioner Tayler was right or wrong in the course he recommended. On receiving the news that this large reinforcement had been received by the enemy, that they had cut his line of communication, and that reinforcements would cease to reach them for many weeks, his father wrote this letter—

“Camp Mungurwar, August 8, 1857.

“Imperious circumstances compel me to recross the Ganges. When further defence becomes impossible, do not negotiate or capitulate. Cut your way out to Cawnpore; you will save the colours of the 32nd, and two-thirds of your British troops. Blow up your fortifications, magazines, &c., by constructing surcharged mines under them and leaving slow matches burning.

H. HAVELOCK, Brigadier General.

To Colonel INGLIS, Commanding Lucknow.”

Why was this advice rendered necessary? His father was compelled to give it, because Commissioner Tayler's advice was not followed, and because this large reinforcement was allowed to reach the enemy intact, and to cut their communications. He apologized for referring to this personal matter, and assured the House that he only did so under a strong impelling sense to obey the dictates of justice and honour,—in letting the truth be known—which, he believed, were not extinct, and never would be extinct, in that House. Since that time Mr. Tayler had, from time to time, endeavoured in poverty, in circumstances of unexampled trial and depression during 31 years, to call the attention of his countrymen to the injustice he had suffered. He (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) came now to a dark and unexplained circumstance, which, if it stood alone, would justify the request now made, that fuller investigation into this case should take place. In 1878 he was engaged with Sir Eardley Wilmot in bringing this case before Parliament. He had sent Memorials to the India Office, which were not then replied to. They were told in July, 1878, that it was desirable that inquiry should be deferred, because a very comprehensive Minute on the subject had been prepared by Sir Frederick Halliday, and that it would shortly be laid before the House. That reply stopped action in 1878. In 1879 other circumstances intervened to prevent the case being taken up, and in 1880 there was a change of Government. But he wished to draw the attention of the House to a circumstance, which had remained unexplained to this day, and such circumstances fortunately did not often happen. When the papers on which Commissioner Tayler relied for his defence were searched for, it was found that they were absent from the records of the India Office, and could not be traced. He cast imputation on no person. It so happened that the parties in this case on the one side and the other were equally friends of his, and he should not like to be swayed by the slightest bias against anyone, or by any feeling but that which was usually felt by an Englishman to stand up for a man whom he believed to be oppressed and injured. As he had said, all the papers required by Mr. Tayler to prove his case were abstracted from the India Office. The only thing that could be discovered of the voluminous documents was the fly-leaf, which bore the simple Minute of the Duke of Argyll in 1868, that his Grace was against the re-opening of the case. He (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan)

did not wish to attach any further importance to that remarkable incident than it deserved; but he did say that when official documents disappeared in this extraordinary way, the question naturally arose whether anyone, and if so who, was most interested in their disappearance. Fortunately, they were not at a loss as to the facts. Through 31 years of privation, of loss of position, of circumstances which would have broken any man of inferior courage and spirit, Mr. Tayler had survived to bear the test of public investigation, and the gentleman who was mixed up with Mr. Tayler in the events of that time, the gentlemen of whom he (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) did not wish to say a word stronger than was warranted by circumstances, but who, at all events, was the sole opposing element in the case, also survived. This was not a case like that of Lord Dundonald, where all who had been originally concerned in the events which had led to acts of injustice had passed away, though even in that case in 1878 justice was at last done to the memory of a great and gallant gentleman, and to those who had succeeded him. As to the present case, they were in no such difficulty. The accused and the accuser, if they might be said to stand in that position, were still before them, and the documents were forthcoming in abundance. Every historian who had judicially examined the circumstances of this case had been unanimously in asserting that Commissioner Tayler, of Patna, had certainly established his position as having, not only acted with judgment, but as having thoroughly earned the gratitude of his country. This man was now 81 years of age. In the course of nature his life could not be much longer prolonged. He had borne with unexampled courage what he (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) and his hon. Friends believed to be an intolerable injustice and wrong. He appealed to both sides of the House on the question. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), though the right hon. Gentleman had no personal responsibility in the matter. The right hon. Gentleman was, however, at the head of the Government during the period of many of the transactions referred to. He appealed also to the right hon. Gentleman the

First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), who, he was sure, was actuated on all occasions by a sense of inflexible justice. To that sense of justice he now appealed. Give this man an open and fair inquiry. If it was shown that Mr. Tayler had committed an error no harm would be done, because the grave would soon close over a sad story. But if, on the other hand, it could be shown that justice had been continually postponed by the resistance of one man, who, from his official position, had been better able to thwart Mr. Tayler than anyone else could have been, then he said that not only was the national faith involved, but the national sense of justice was involved in doing complete justice in this matter, though justice had been so long deferred. He begged to second the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is desirable, with a view to the settlement of a long-standing controversy as to the wrong stated to have been suffered by a meritorious servant of the Crown, that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into the case of Mr. William Tayler, late Commissioner of Patna,"—(Sir Roper Lethbridge,) —instead thereof.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham) said, that he, in common with the other Members of the House, had listened with great pleasure to the manly and eloquent speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Durham (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan). He hoped the House would believe him when he said that the Secretary of State for India was as anxious to do justice to anyone who was suffering under undeserved obloquy as was the hon. and gallant Member himself; but before the House embarked a Select Committee upon an inquiry into this voluminous case a plain, unvarnished statement of the facts ought to be laid before it. The two speeches which had been made had been rather the speeches of advocates putting forward points chosen to produce an impression that injustice had been done, than impartial statements of fact such as it was his duty to submit. The real grievance had been greatly exaggerated, for it had been said that this gentleman had been dismissed from the Public Service. He was not dismissed; he was simply superseded in the position he held at Patna. He was transferred from that position to another, and if it had not been for subsequent events he might for a long period have served the Crown. The House had to consider whether, in all the circumstances of the case, the Government of India of the day were justified in removing Mr. Tayler from Patna and putting him elsewhere. He would give the reasons which induced the Government of India to take that course. But he must first object that this was not a matter on which there ought to be an appeal to all. The Empire of India was imperilled, and the Government, in the action it took on that occasion, must be judged by the rules of military procedure. Supposing a Commanding Officer in the middle of a battle were to remove an officer from some post under some misapprehension, would it be endured that there should be an inquiry whether the General had justly estimated the capacity of the man? The second objection he had was that the bringing forward of the question compelled him to rake up matters that were more than 30 years old, and charges against Mr. Tayler that the existing Members of the Government of India would be glad to bury in oblivion. If he was obliged to mention things which did not entirely redound to the credit of Mr. Tayler, it was the fault of those who now brought the matter forward. He would not go into extraneous matters. It had been mentioned that before the Mutiny it was intended to remove Mr. Tayler from Patna. That intention was formed in consequence of complaints which afterwards received the investigation of the Secretary of State, and as to which the Secretary of State decided that the Government of Bengal were right and Mr. Tayler was wrong. With this explanation, he would begin with the date of the 7th of June, 1857, when the first alarm occurred at Patna. It was on the 31st of July following that Mr. Tayler issued the withdrawal order, and the events he would deal with occurred within those two dates. He wished to read Mr. Tayler's own description of the resolution which he formed on the 7th of June as to the conduct he would pursue during the critical days that he foresaw. He said—

“Then it was that, after carefully pondering the various sources of danger, after weighing and comparing the information brought to me from various sources, I resolved to adopt a series of coercive measures which would anticipate and nullify any movement that might be contemplated, and draw the teeth of the disloyal before they had opportunity to bite.”

And he afterwards said—

“All was done on my own sole responsibility, without the permission or knowledge of Mr. Halliday.”

[Cheers.] The House cheered that as if, at a moment when you were fighting against mutiny, insubordination was something to be admired. He strongly objected to that. If ever there was a crisis in the history of the world it was that of the Mutiny. No doubt, there had been instances of splendid insubordination, such as that of Lord Nelson at Copenhagen, or even that committed on this very occasion by the officer who disobeyed Mr. Tayler himself; but these were isolated cases of disobedience in some one particular matter. A man who did such a thing, did it with a rope round his neck; he ran the risk of failure; but he might succeed and have his act condoned by his superior officer. He protested, however, against the doctrine which seemed to find favour with some hon. Members, that you were to embark in dangerous operations of this kind with the predetermination that you would tell your superior officer—“All was done on my sole responsibility, without the permission—[“Hear, hear!”]—or knowledge—[“Hear, hear!”]—of my superiors.”

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: There were no orders.

SIR JOHN GORST said, he was astonished that any hon. Member should cheer such a sentiment. The arrest of the four Wahabees took place on the 20th of June. These gentlemen were never brought to trial; they were discharged afterwards with the knowledge and approval of Mr. Taylor himself, and no conspiracy and no offence of any kind was proved against these men. The hon. and gallant Member for Durham said that this was a great accusation made against Mr. Tayler; but he never heard that any accusation was made against Mr. Tayler in respect of these men.

Sir John Gorst

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN said, he had been misapprehended; he did not say that. He said the particular accusation was the withdrawal order. He was not aware that Mr. Tayler was ever censured for the arrest of these men, which was perfectly justified.

SIR JOHN GORST said, he was not censured for arresting them; but Sir John Kaye, to whom the hon. Member for North Kensington appealed, said of this event, in his History of the Mutiny—

"It can hardly escape the consideration of any candid mind that what is thus regarded as a successful stroke of policy when executed by Englishmen against Mahomedans would, if Englishmen had been the victims of it, have been described by another name. To invite men to a friendly conference and, when actually the guests of a British officer, to seize their persons is not only very like treachery, but is treachery itself. . . . The exigencies of a great crisis justify exceptional acts in the interests of public safety; but I do not know any excuses that may be pleaded or arguments that may be advanced by a British officer in such a case that might not be pleaded and advanced by Native Chiefs in like circumstances. But, whatsoever other successes this stroke of policy may have brought, the tranquillization of Patna was not one of them."

What was chiefly complained of was not the actual arrest, but that no information was given to the Government. On the 25th of June the following letter was addressed by the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal to Mr. Tayler:—

"Intelligence has reached the Lieutenant Governor from a private source that on the 21st instant you arrested certain influential Native gentlemen at Patna, and caused the town to be searched in order to disarm the population. Whether these measures were right or wrong the Lieutenant Governor has no means of judging. They are certainly extraordinary, and at first sight open to much question. But the Lieutenant Governor has to complain seriously that he hears on such occasions nothing from you of your intentions and nothing of your acts till after they had been completed, and that your method of reporting to Government at the present important crisis is loose, desultory, and incomplete."

And on the 26th of June the Government wrote—

"Your promised letter of the 22nd instant has just been received. It contains no detail of any sort, but is written, as usual, in a hurried and careless manner, with an intimation that you are too busy to write in detail, and will write more in a day or two. You add—'I have the four principal Wahabees in custody, and am just going to catch Ali Kureem.' Not a word is said to explain this extraordinary and dangerous measure, or why these arrests are made and to be made. I am directed to repeat to you that this conduct is most unsatisfactory. You cannot have so much to do as to be unable to afford the smallest information of your proceedings, especially when they are of a nature very questionable in appearance. At all events, it is your duty and your business to keep the Government informed of what you are doing, and you can have no work of greater or more pressing necessity than to do this. The Lieutenant Governor regrets to be obliged thus to urge you on such very obvious points of duty which no other Commissioner has neglected."

Then the next day they complained again—

"The dawn of the 23rd has come in from Patna, and the Lieutenant Governor has again to complain of the absence of all information of your proceedings. He has received a scarcely intelligible demi-official note from you dated the 23rd instant, written, as usual, in a hurry, and affording no tangible information. It is very probable you may be doing all that is right, and the Lieutenant Governor is willing to place all reasonable confidence in your zeal and discretion; but that you should keep the Government wholly in the dark for days and days together while you darkly intimate that you are adopting measures of great responsibility and importance, is, I am directed to say, quite intolerable. It is impossible that you should have anything to do of greater importance than keeping the Government informed of your proceedings. Should this most unsatisfactory state of things not be speedily amended, the Lieutenant Governor, I am directed to say, will be constrained to supersede you, however unwillingly, in order that he may have at Patna an officer who will keep up proper and necessary communication with his superiors. But he trusts that you will not force him to this extremity."

On the 29th of June they wrote again—

"Having no knowledge whatever of your information or its sources, or the objects and principles of your acts and measures, and but very little knowledge of the acts and measures themselves, regarding all which you have kept him in ignorance, the Lieutenant Governor is unable to give you any directions or instructions to guide or assist you. It seems evident that you are doing irregular and probably illegal acts, and are incurring serious responsibility, but you may be able hereafter to explain and justify them. Meantime your own responsibility is greatly increased by your omitting to enable the Government to understand either what you are doing or why you are doing it."

He had read these letters to show that at the very outset Mr. Tayler was cautioned by the Government of Bengal, and that the course of conduct he prescribed for himself was such as it was impossible for any Government to allow. On July 17 Mr. Tayler wrote the following answer to the Government of Bengal—

"I may, perhaps, be pardoned at a crisis like the present for stating that when I had made up my mind to act thus decisively I purposely put my plan into execution without asking for authority, because I deemed it possible that the Lieutenant Governor, judging from a distance, might not possibly have approved of measures which to some extent undoubtedly are beyond the law, but which I, on the spot, felt to be essential for the safety of Patna."

To that the Government replied on the 22nd of July, 1857—

"The only part of this letter which appears to the Lieutenant Governor to call for immediate notice is what is stated in paragraphs 6 to 9, in which you avow that you wilfully and purposely kept the Government uninformed of your intentions, acts, and measures. This conduct you persevered in, not only up to the time of carrying out the measures referred to, but for some time afterwards, and indeed until you were compelled, by repeated and strong censures, to adopt a different course. In doing this I am to observe you committed a grave and very reprehensible error, and you cannot but be sensible that the knowledge that it is in your opinion justifiable in an officer to conceal his official acts and purposes from the head of the Government he serves, if he has reason to suppose that they will not be approved, must make it impossible for the Lieutenant Governor to place implicit confidence in you."

What were the acts which were being committed? They had been described as "hanging and imprisoning wholesale." ["Hear, hear!"] There were some Members in the House who appeared to think that as long as it was only a coloured man that was hanged it did not matter. All he wanted to show the House was the nature of the acts which were described as illegal and irregular, and which Mr. Tayler was all this time committing. He could not give a better example than the case of one Waris Ali, a jemadar of police. This man was arrested and handed over to Major Holmes, who was generally regarded in India as what is called "a man of action." Major Holmes sent the man on to General Lloyd with a very remarkable letter, which he would read to the House. It ran as follows:—

"My dear General,—The magistrate of Tirhoot has sent me a jemadar of police with a polite request to hang him up. The chief evidence against this man is a letter of doubtful import, in which he speaks of a great merchandise and his friends joining to obtain the pearl of his desire, rebellion and murder—rather vague to string a chap upon—so I have sent him to you in irons that he may be placed in the European barracks, and his fellow-conspirators at Patna being seized the matter can be properly sifted by a Commission of European officers and justice dealt out accordingly."

On the 30th of June, Major Holmes wrote to the General again about the man Waris Ali as follows:—

"I wish to point out that my great power over my own men and the Natives of these parts arises from their own sense of my perfect justice and perfect determination. They know that if I am convinced that a man is guilty his life is not worth an hour's purchase; but were I to condemn a man on mere suspicion, which was really all I had to go on in this case, I should be looked upon as bloody-minded and unjust, and I should lose half my real power. I went over those papers carefully with my Native officers, and they and I quite concur in our minds about them."

This man, Waris Ali, was sent by General Lloyd to Mr. Tayler, and he arrived at Patna on July 1 or 2. Mr. Tayler postponed his trial for two or three days in the hope of eliciting information from him. On July 6 he put him on his trial. The evidence adduced was the same as that which Major Holmes had thought insufficient; but Mr. Tayler convicted the man and hanged him the same day. The following was the account which Mr. Tayler gave in his own words:—

"Waris Ali, whose arrest has been previously mentioned, was tried under the Commission on Monday, the 6th of July, and capitally sentenced. He was executed the same day, and his last words were to ask whether no Mussulman would assist him. This man is said to be related to the Royal Family of Delhi. He was a large, stout, and good-looking man, and was selected, I imagine, more for these qualities and his family connection, and perhaps for the assistance which his position in the police enabled him to give. I postponed his trial for two or three days after his arrival, and had several private interviews with him in the hope of eliciting information. But he was evidently, I think, not in Ali Kureem's secrets, as he was in such excessive alarm and despair that I am convinced he would have done anything to save his life. When speaking in private with him he implored me to tell him whether there was any way in which his life could be spared. I said 'Yes,' and his eyes opened with unmistakable delight, and when he asked again what the way was his countenance was a picture of anxiety, hope, and terror. I told him—'I will make a bargain with you; give me three lives and I will give you yours.' He then told me all the names that I already know; but could disclose nothing further, at least with any proof in support. He was evidently not sufficiently clever to be Ali Kureem's confidant."

He would give the House another case. On July 3 occurred the only disturbance that took place at Patna. That riot commenced by the assembling of 50 or 100 men at the house of a bookseller. They were armed with guns and swords and spears. They were met and kept in check by two men, a patrol, and a Soubahdar. It was quite true that the patrol was killed; but the two men succeeded in checking the rioters. The only European that was killed was Dr. Lyell, who had galloped on in front of the Sikh soldiers who accompanied him, and came alone into the middle of the excited crowd. The whole thing did not last three-quarters of an hour. In connection with this riot, a trial was held by Mr. Tayler under an Act then in force, a kind of Drumhead Court Martial Act, which gave tremendous power to the Commissioners appointed under it. The trial took place on the 7th of July, four days after the riot; and out of a number of men tried, Mr. Tayler sentenced 14 to death—all being found guilty, he said, on clear evidence. With the exception of two, they were all hanged within two hours of being sentenced. They were tried by Commission under Act XIV. of 1857, of which the 9th section said that on every person convicted of murder, arson, &c., the Court might pass any sentence warranted by law, and the judgment of such Court should be final and conclusive and the Court should not be subject to the Sudder or any other Court. That was an Act under which the Commissioners ought to have acted with the greatest care and gravest sense of responsibility. He could not read to the House the evidence on which these men were hanged. He had read it himself, and, having had some experience in such matters, he must say that, so far from being clear evidence, it was evidence open to the greatest doubt and the gravest suspicion. The House might easily understand why that was the case, because the riot happened at dusk, about 7 o'clock in the evening, the faces of the men engaged in it were all tied up with cloths, and the evidence of identity was given by persons who did not previously know the accused. Of all things in the world evidence was the most unreliable. But he would not ask the House to take his word for it. Mr. Lewis, the magistrate, wrote in February, 1858, about eight months after, to Mr. Samuells, who was then Commissioner of Patna, as follows:—

“As Patna is now considered quiet, I would beg to bring to your notice a circumstance connected with the late disturbances there, which, should you think fit, you can lay before Government. After the riot in which Dr. Lyell lost his life, certain persons, said to have been concerned in it were brought up for trial before Mr. Tayler, the then Commissioner, and myself. Of the guilt of some of these men there was certainly no doubt, and they were accordingly convicted and at once hung. Of the participation of the other prisoners I had, however, strong doubts, and I held that on the evidence against them it was impossible for me to convict. I therefore proposed remanding them till further inquiry could be made. To this Mr. Tayler objected, and endeavoured to prove that, there being the same evidence against all, all must be equally guilty. This, however, failed to convince me, and I still adhered to my former opinion. Mr. Tayler then proposed that the prisoners should be sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment, and that when the country became quiet the Government might, if it saw fit, inquire into the matter. The critical state of affairs demanded that no difference of opinion should appear between us. I therefore yielded the point so strongly urged by Mr. Tayler, and consented to the sentence of imprisonment being recorded, determined to refer the matter as soon as quiet was restored. I had hoped that Mr. Tayler would have joined me in this reference, and wrote to him inviting him to do so, but he declines having anything to do with the matter, the whole of the above circumstances having apparently escaped his memory.”

Here was what Mr. R. M. Farquharson, Sessions Judge, Patna, wrote to the Governor of Bengal on July 25, 1857—

“It is currently reported here that some of those punished for being concerned in the late outbreak in the City of Patna were convicted by the Commission, presided over by Mr. Tayler, on evidence less reliable even than that I have rejected in Looft Ali Khan's case. I am not in the least cognizant of what that evidence was, but consider it my duty to report the common opinion on the subject, that Government may take any steps it thinks fit to ascertain the truth of reports, very damaging, not only to the Civil Service, but to the European character at large. I am the more induced to this step from the fact of Mr. Tayler disregarding the Government instructions of the 11th of July, 1857, and persisting in conducting trials himself, notwithstanding the presence of the Judge. Mr. Tayler has probably reported to Government his having tried and condemned to death a trooper of Captain Rattray's regiment since receipt of the Government letter No. 1,179 of the 11th of July above alluded to.”

But that was not all. Here was an extract from a Minute by Lord Canning, dated February 5, 1859—

“I believe that in the course of Mr. Tayler's proceedings men were condemned and executed upon insufficient evidence. But since this took place Mr. Tayler has, for other reasons, been suspended from judicial office, and has said that he intends shortly to resign the Service. . . . Mr. Tayler's individual case would, no doubt, be disposed of more thoroughly and incontrovertibly if the opinion of the Judges were taken upon this part of it; but if the omission to do this is not regarded by Mr. Tayler as unjust towards himself, I see no sufficient reason for keeping the discussion open by a further appeal to the Sudder Bench.”

Mr. Taylor was subsequently asked whether he wished that an inquiry should be held by the Sudder Court Judges as to whether he had not convicted and sentenced men on evidence which was not reasonably sufficient; and this was what Mr. Taylor, in reply, said in a letter to the Secretary to the Government of Bengal, dated the 24th of March, 1859—

"Under the peculiar circumstances of the case, as Mr. Samuella has disavowed the offensive and dishonouring imputations which his words appear to me to convey, and as I am about so soon to resign the Service, I have no desire to subject myself to any further anxiety or harassment. While, therefore, I am thankful to the Governor General in Council for offering me the option of a public inquiry, I beg respectfully to decline it, and shall take the liberty of submitting hereafter the reasons which have induced me to do so."

So that this gentleman, who had the same charges made against him 30 years ago, and being offered a public inquiry before the Judges of the Sudder Court declined the offer, came to-day to the House of Commons and asked for that public inquiry which he might have had 30 years ago. Moreover, the complaint against Mr. Taylor was not only that he acted with injustice himself, but that he improperly interfered with the course of justice administered by others. A certain person named Looft Ali Khan was accused by Mr. Taylor, who caused him to be arrested. He was then tried by the Judge of Patna, and while the man was under trial Mr. Taylor wrote a series of letters to Mr. Farquharson (the Judge), Mr. Taylor himself being virtually the prosecutor. In a letter to the Sessions Judge of July 9, 1857, he said—

"Last the supposed respectability of Looft Ali Khan should in any way tend to throw doubt on the probability of his guilt, I beg to inform you that Guseeta, one of the most active of the rebels concerned in the late outrage in which Dr. Lyell lost his life, is this man's Jemadar. Guseeta has been sentenced to death by Mr. Lewis and myself. Another Guseeta, clearly implicated in the same crime, states that his mother is ayah to Looft Ali Khan's mother. That some wealthy party has been at the bottom of the intrigues that are now shown to have been carried on here for months, with an object not to be mistaken, is evident from the fact that men have been kept for months on pay, regularly distributed, under a conditional compact to come forward when called for."

And in a letter to Mr. Farquharson of July 14, 1857, Mr. Taylor said—

"Looft Ali Khan seems to have had a nest of ruffians in employ; two of the hangers are shown to have been closely connected with him. The man himself admits that he was an Omdawar for eight or ten days with him. I fancy hundreds have been hanged on less evidence than this."

On July 14, 1857, Mr. Taylor also wrote to Mr. Farquharson—

"A little more presumptive evidence and Looft Ali Khan might hang. No one seems to have any moral doubt but that he is deeply implicated, and these are the fellows who do the real mischief, heads worth thousand tails. . . Have the trial rather late, to give me time."

On July 15, 1857, he wrote again—

"As for Looft Ali, my moral conviction of his guilt is so strong that I should not much fear making a mistake about him."

He now came to the withdrawal order. These were Mr. Taylor's words, writing to the Secretary to the Bengal Government on July 31, 1857—

"I have, therefore, authorized all the officials of the district to come into Patna. Those of Choprah have been in for some days; they made an attempt to return to Doorlagunge yesterday, but returned when they heard of the defeat of our force."

The order of the Belgian Government gave the reasons for the removal of Mr. Taylor more clearly than anything he could say, and he would read it to the House. It was as follows:—

"August 4, 1857.

"On the 31st ultimo the Lieutenant Governor received a telegraphic message from Gya announcing that the civil officers of the district were about to abandon the station and all in it, including the large amount of cash in the Treasury. As it was known that the residents had up to the day before been fully prepared to repel attack and to defend themselves, having 45 European soldiers and 100 Sikhs, and Sherghotty, with its little garrison close at hand, and no enemy in sight or in present apprehension, this extraordinary movement was wholly unintelligible to the Lieutenant Governor, and he was disposed to blame very severely the injudicious and pusillanimous conduct of the English officers in question, and did, in fact, send a message after them to that purport. From your letter of the same date, No. 724, which was received late last night and laid before the Lieutenant Governor this morning, he is astonished to find that this most unfortunate and unnecessary retreat was your doing; and that, under the obvious influence of a local panic, you have actually directed the abandonment by the civil functionaries of all the stations in your division. The Lieutenant Governor most strongly disapproves of this act, and considers it not merely injudicious but disgraceful. In the case of Gya, more particularly, it was utterly without reasonable cause, because the station was threatened with no immediate danger, was guarded by a detachment of English and Sikh soldiers, and was in close communication with the trunk road of Sherghotty, where was at the time another detachment of English soldiers. What terrible and unexpected disasters this error may have brought on the stations thus abandoned the Lieutenant Governor is unwilling to surmise. You have already been directed by electric telegraph"— the electric telegraph communication having been interrupted, this message was not transmitted—

"to revoke your orders and to send the residents back to their respective stations if it should be found possible for them to return, and it will remain to be seen whether they will return in time to prevent the otherwise inevitable disasters which their absence, if prolonged, is sure to produce. . . . After the evidence thus afforded of your haste and want of judgment, coming, as it does, after many other reasons for dissatisfaction which you have given to the Lieutenant Governor, it is no longer considered safe that you should continue in charge of your office."

Now, that was the case; these were the facts, and those were the circumstances under which the Government in 1857 had thought it their duty to remove Mr. Tayler from the situation he then held at Patna, and to place him elsewhere in the Public Service. What had happened since threw no fresh light upon the subject. He would gladly stop his remarks there, and allow the House to form its judgment. But so much had been said by the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge) and echoed by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Durham (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) about this case never having been properly considered by the persons responsible, that he must, in common justice, tell the House what an extraordinary amount of consideration the case had received. Mr. Tayler had appealed, as he was perfectly entitled to appeal, against the decision of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal superseding him at Patna. The case was considered by the Governor General in Council, and the appeal was rejected. Mr. Tayler then appealed to the Court of Directors in London, who decided against him. By the time that decision reached India the Government of India had come directly under the Crown, and a fresh appeal was made to the first Secretary of State for India, the present Lord Derby. That appeal was answered in a despatch which showed that Lord Derby fully understood the case with which he had to deal. From the time that the case was so decided, it was not again revived until 1867 or 1868. A great deal had been made of some trials which took place about 1865, which, however, had really nothing to do with this case. There had been four Wahabees arrested at Patna in 1857; no evidence was forthcoming against them, and all were released. Of these four, one was implicated in a conspiracy with reference to the North-West Frontier disturbances about 1863 and 1864. He was tried in 1865, but it was for assisting the rebels in Sittana to urge war against the British Government, and though he was found guilty, there was no evidence implicating him in any conspiracy in connection with any contemplated rising at Patna in 1857. What the trial in 1865 had to do with the case of Mr. Tayler no impartial judge had ever been able to make out. If this man's conviction in 1865 was so important a matter, why had it been allowed to sleep from 1865 to 1868; and why, when Mr. Tayler first made his appeal to Sir Stafford Northcote, had he asked merely for the grant of some honour? In the autumn of 1868, Mr. Tayler had sent in his celebrated Memorial, which was too late to be dealt with by Sir Stafford Northcote, but afterwards came under the consideration of the Duke of Argyll, who succeeded Sir Stafford on the change of Government. Now, a great deal had been said about the loss of this document. Well, it was lost, but a copy of it survived, and no injury had been done to Mr. Tayler through the loss of the original Memorial.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: The copy was supplied by Mr. Tayler himself afterwards.

SIR JOHN GORST said, he did not see how that made any difference. The hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Durham had drawn a picture—which had almost moved him to tears, official though he was—of the condition into which the negligence of the India Office had put Mr. Tayler. But they were not lawyers, and an authentic copy was as useful as the original document. There was an authentic copy in the India Office, on the Table of the House, and in the Library. The Duke of Argyll's decision, no doubt, was never communicated to Mr. Tayler; but that was very much Mr. Tayler's own fault. He went away to India and begged there might be no decision till he came back. When he came back, he communicated repeatedly with the India Office; but for years he never asked for any decision regarding his case. Though, no doubt, it was an oversight not to communicate the decision to him, that was, as he had already said, very much Mr. Tayler's own fault. And from that day to the present, this case had been before every Secretary of State. Every Under Secretary, every Member of Council, everybody who had had anything to do with the administration of affairs in India for the last 20 years had had to consider it. For his own part, the House knew very well he could not reveal the secrets of his prison house; but he pledged his word, from memoranda which he had himself read from some of the most illustrious men who had served the State in India, that the case of Mr. Tayler had been most carefully considered again and again and again. It would be idle for his noble Friend the present Secretary of State for India to constitute himself into a Court of Appeal against the decision of every one of his Predecessors who had held the Seals of the India Office. The House had now the whole case before it. He had no prejudices of his own; but he hoped he had stated enough to lead the House to believe that the Government of Lord Canning in 1857, when it thought it consistent with its duty to remove Mr. Tayler from the position he held at Patna, was not animated by those unworthy motives suggested by the hon. and gallant Member, but solely by a desire to save India from an extreme peril, and because it honestly believed he was a man whose administration was likely to prove inimical to the safety of the Indian Empire.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, that personally he knew nothing of Mr. Tayler; but, like most hon. Members of the House, no doubt, he had read a good deal of correspondence and a great many pamphlets on the subject. Generally speaking, he did not read the pamphlets sent to him complaining of grievances; but a friend of his who knew Mr. Tayler had urged him to read the one in Mr. Tayler's case, saying, "Look into it yourself!" Well, he had looked into it, and, though he would not, for his own part, justify everything that Mr. Tayler had done, he was convinced that this gentleman had experienced substantial injustice. He was not alone in that opinion; that opinion was shared by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst), because, in 1879, a Petition was presented to the House of Commons through the late Sir Stafford Northcote, as Leader of the House, signed by the hon. Gentleman amongst others, stating that it came from Gentlemen deeply interested in Her Majesty's Indian Empire, and that they, being fully acquainted with the eminent services of Mr. William Tayler, in saving the great Province of Patna in the Mutiny of 1857, and of the manner in which his services had been requited, could not but express approval of the Petition lately addressed to the House by Mr. Tayler, and therefore prayed that the House would be pleased to consider the extraordinary amount, variety, and weight of the evidence on record as to the eminent services rendered by Mr. Tayler. With regard to the investigation in 1865, which the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India sneered at, it was said, in the Petition he had signed, that amongst other reasons for doing justice to Mr. Tayler was the reason that two members of the Supreme Council in Calcutta, Sir John Lowe and Mr. Dorey, had expressed regret that they had been misinformed as to the facts of the case which led to the arrest of the Wahabee conspirators, it having been proved that those persons were dangerous traitors. The hon. Gentlemen had given them his official view of the case; but in the Petition which he had signed when not in Office he had given an independent view as a person interested in, and knowing much of, the Government of India. Well, the hon. Gentleman had gone back to the question of the withdrawal order through having given which Sir Frederick Halliday, the Lieutenant Governor, charged Mr. Tayler with having yielded to panic. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to an appeal made by Mr. Tayler to the Directors of the India Company. What did they reply to that appeal? They replied that they considered Mr. Tayler's conduct praiseworthy in the main, but that he had been guilty of an error of judgment—nothing but "an error of judgment" in issuing this order of withdrawal. He (Mr. Labouchere) was not a military man, and did not know whether the order of withdrawal was a wise or foolish one. All he knew was this, that the men to whom the order was sent were our outposts, and that they knew what was going on, Europeans being destroyed in all parts of the country, that there were no troops near them, and that they, therefore, could not withdraw, and that no sooner did they get troops near them than they withdrew themselves and their treasure, not to Patna, which was near, but to Calcutta, which was 400 miles off. Therefore, the order seemed a perfectly reasonable one, though he was free to admit that it might have been an error of judgment. The hon. Gentleman had called attention to the action of Mr. Tayler in hanging and imprisoning inhabitants of Patna. These charges had really never been made against Mr. Tayler by the Lieutenant Governor except under circumstances which he would show. It was true that Mr. Tayler did arrest 30 men, and had about 14 hanged. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India said he supposed that it was only those who approved of coloured men being hanged because they were coloured men who would applaud. But what had occurred? The House would remember that this Town of Patna was a town of 2,000 inhabitants, and that the Province round it that was to be kept down consisted of 11,000,000 inhabitants. It must be remembered that it was the great centre of the Wahabees for a long time, and that so far back as 1846, and for a number of years before, these Wahabees had been discovered tampering with the loyalty of the Sepoys. There was a considerable European population there, and Mr. Tayler was responsible for their lives. He was obliged to take exceptionally severe measures. He (Mr. Labouchere) considered that all this hanging and shooting was far too severe, but that was not the question at this moment; they must take the matter from the Governmental point of view. Mr. Tayler was not attacked by men like them, Radicals, but he was attacked by Members of the Government, who lauded and praised others who did precisely what Mr. Tayler had done, and that was where he (Mr. Labouchere) thought that injustice had been done. Dr. Lyell, as the hon. Gentleman had said, was murdered. That was nothing. It was a little émeute which lasted only three quarters of an hour. Waris Ali was condemned to death and executed, but he (Mr. Labouchere) would point out that Colonel Malleson in his history—from which the hon. Member had read one or two extracts—said that upon his person were found a number of compromising letters. Waris Ali was not executed until after Dr. Lyell had been murdered, at the same time as the other prisoners were, in order, no doubt, to keep down the insurrection which was ready to break out. It must be remembered that these Wahabees were ready to rise in insurrection at any moment in Patna, that the garrison at Dingapore had been decimated, that the commander at Arrah had been killed, and that Europeans were still there and were being surrounded by a mass of mutineers who were trying to take their lives. Whilst he deprecated all this severity, he did think that the Government itself should look at the matter with a certain amount of leniency and should not bring up a charge—which had practically never been made before—30 years after the occurrence of the event. Sir Frederick Halliday did examine the records to see whether a charge could be substantiated against Mr. Tayler for having illegally permitted these executions. He submitted the records to Judge Latour—an eminent Judge in Calcutta. Judge Latour could make nothing of them. He could not say that injustice had been done, looking at the way that justice was dealt out at that time, and Sir Frederick Halliday never again alluded to the charge. But there was a Mr. Samuells there who had been sent to replace Commissioner Tayler. Mr. Samuells, it appeared, had a strong feeling against Mr. Tayler, and after the records had been examined and Sir Frederick Halliday had said there was nothing in them, this gentleman brought the charge for a second time and asked to be allowed to examine the records. Why on earth should he do that? Sir Frederick Halliday had already done it. What was his charge? Why, that the majority of the people at Patna considered that the criminals who had been sentenced were innocent. Mr. Samuells was called on to substantiate his charge, and an inquiry took place, and what did that inquiry say? Why, that there were certain criticisms as to the proceedings and evidence that might be brought forward, but that the actual charge of having sentenced these men who were innocent to the knowledge of the people of Patna was not proved. The whole point at that time was that there had been errors in taking evidence. The House was somewhat surprised when it heard from the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India that Mr. Tayler had been told that he should submit his case to the Judges of Calcutta, and that he had refused to do so. It must be remembered, however, that Mr. Tayler was then being attacked by all the officials, who were very much inclined, on their parts, to hang together. Mr. Samuells wrote a despatch to Sir Frederick Halliday on this matter. He (Mr. Labouchere) would give one or two words from it to show the sort of language used by one of these officials in writing to another as to Mr. Tayler. He said Mr. Tayler's despatches were "daubed with the blackest colours against his immediate superior the Lieutenant Governor and his successor;" that he was "guilty of dishonest artifice;" that "much of what he said was pure slander;" that what he had done was "a simple piece of impertinence;" that he was guilty of "a pack of impudent libels;" that he was "utterly unscrupulous," a "charlatan;" that he was "guilty of bare-faced clap-trap;" and that he "simply talked nonsense." One would have thought that Sir Frederick Halliday would have deprecated that language. He said, however, that "the despatch was written in somewhat less measured terms than was customary in official correspondence, but that it was a very successful performance." Under the circumstances, when it was proposed to Mr. Tayler to submit for inquiry the one point, whether he had been guilty of technical illegalities as to the sentences at Patna, he was perfectly right in refusing to accept the reference, because the main charge was that he was guilty of panic in the matter of the withdrawal order. No sort of proposal or offer was made to Mr. Tayler, telling him that this would be submitted to the Judges or anyone else. Now he (Mr. Labouchere) came to what happened in England. He had stated, so far as he could understand it, what took place in India from the speech of the hon. Gentleman, and the official papers they had.

Mr. Labouchere

What happened in England? Unquestionably, Mr. Tayler did apply to Sir Stafford Northcote. What did Sir Stafford Northcote say? He promised, in a letter which had been read in the House, that there should be a full and fair inquiry, and handed over his letter to the Duke of Argyll. Now there was a sort of continuity in public offices. When one Secretary of State promised a full and fair inquiry, his Successor was bound to make that full and fair inquiry. But what happened? Why the Successor in this case made no inquiry at all. It was not pretended that he did. All that was produced was a scrap of paper on which the noble Duke wrote, that in his opinion the case ought not to be re-opened. After that, Mr. Tayler went to India. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India said, it was that Gentleman's own fault—owing to his own negligence—that he did not get an answer from the India Office. He (Mr. Labouchere) understood that Mr. Tayler was invited by Lord Northbrook—who was Governor General at the time, and who had a better opinion of this gentleman than the hon. Gentleman the present Under Secretary—to go over to India in some sort of capacity on the occasion of the visit of the Prince of Wales, and he went over to India. He did not, however, receive from the India Office any statement that any decision had been come to in the case. The last official declaration made to him was that there was to be a full and fair inquiry. He awaited that inquiry, and had a perfect right to expect that it would take place, but when he at last read in a newspaper that the papers he had sent in had been, in a most extraordinary fashion, stolen, and that all that remained was a scrap of paper with words written on it that the case was not to be re-opened, he at once wrote to the India Office asking what was to be done. All he was told was that the Duke of Argyll had said that the case would not be re-opened. Four successive times Lord Salisbury, Lord Beaconsfield and others, had questions put to them in the House of Lords. What was the answer given in the House of Lords? Were the charges now made by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State brought against Mr. Tayler? Not a bit of it. The reply made was that such a long time had elapsed that the inquiry could not be made. He admitted that, considering the doubtful evidence, there was great difficulty, in a debate like this in the House of Commons, in coming to a clear decision. But, there was the expressed opinion of historians and eminent men like Sir Bartle Frere, that this man had been treated with injustice. For a large number of years he had applied for justice, and from the fact, the impartial fact, that Sir Stafford Northcote in his official position of Secretary of State for India had promised an inquiry, an inquiry ought to take place. He did not know whether Mr. Tayler was worthy of honours or orders, but he did know this, that many men who were respected in the House thought so. The Press of India was of that opinion. Lord Napier of Magdala, Sir Bartle Frere, and many others had demanded that he should have honours. In any case, the hon. Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge), who had brought forward this matter, and the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for the South-East Division of Durham (Sir Henry Havelock-Allen), who had seconded the Motion, had made a fair case for inquiry, and he (Mr. Labouchere) did hope, that as this man was now 82 years of age, and it was not to be expected that he would remain in this world for ever, before he was removed from the world he would be allowed to have this inquiry—some form of Commission or Select Committee or something of that kind. That was all he (Mr. Labouchere) pleaded for, and he maintained that they had made out a prima facie case in favour of the Motion.

MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham) said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) began his speech with the ingenuous confession that he knew hardly anything about this subject. The hon. Gentleman did not quite do himself justice in making that statement, because his speech showed them he knew a great deal; unfortunately, however, his knowledge was all on one side. The hon. Gentleman referred to the great number of pamphlets and memorials which had been distributed amongst the Members of the House. It was a fact that this subject had been overlaid with an enormous mass of literary material extending over 30 years; it was so voluminous that Members of the House might be pardoned for not trying to make themselves acquainted with it. But that literature was almost entirely composed of the essays of Mr. Tayler himself, and of the evidence he had contrived to bring together during the last 30 years, in order to show he was unfairly treated during the time of the Mutiny. Anybody who took the trouble to look through the official documents which the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) had said were in the Library of the House, and read the answer of Sir Frederick Halliday to the memorial of Mr. Tayler—true, it was written some 10 years ago—would know there was a very great deal, indeed, to be said on the other side. He (Mr. J. M. Maclean) admitted that Mr. Tayler had been very fortunate in his advocates in the House that evening. His hon. Friend the Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge) stated the case with great moderation and dexterity, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir Henry Havelock-Allen) seconded the Motion in a speech which appealed to all the generous instincts of the House, and which was full of personal reminiscences of the Mutiny that were rendered very interesting by the references to the deeds of his illustrious and ever to be lamented father. But it was necessary they should approach the discussion of this question without having their feelings so strongly moved. There was one passage in the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for North Kensington which he very much regretted to hear, and which greatly disfigured the speech. The hon. Gentleman permitted himself to insinuate that Sir Henry Maine in advising the Council of India not to re-open this case was animated by some paltry personal feelings arising out of a quarrel—

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE said, he distinctly stated that he made no imputation, and he wished to make none. He stated, he believed that no imputation could properly be made, and in referring to ancient feuds, he remarked that surely at that time those feuds might be forgotten.

MR. J. M. MACLEAN denied that there was any private quarrel between Sir Henry Maine and Mr. Tayler, though they were opposed in some paltry case.

But to what purpose did the hon. Member introduce any mention of that case, except to create a prejudice against Sir Henry Maine, and to suggest to the minds of hon. members that that eminent man had been animated by some other motive than a regard for truth and the public interest when he advised, three years ago, that this case should not be re-opened by the India office? Mr. Tayler himself was spoken of by the hon. Member for North Kensington as a ruined and broken man. But certainly Mr. Tayler's conduct during the last 30 years had not been that of a ruined or broken man. Mr. Tayler had shown a most extraordinary spirit in the misfortune he was supposed to have suffered. Now, what was the position in which this gentleman was actually placed by the Government of India? Many Members of the House possibly supposed that this man was cast adrift, without a penny in his pocket, utterly ruined in character and fortune. What were the facts of the case? Mr. Tayler was, at the time of the Mutiny, the Governor of the Province of Patna, and in receipt of a salary of about £4,000 a-year. When he was superseded by Sir Frederick Halliday, he was appointed to a Judgeship, in which position he received about £3,000 a year. That was not a very great fall in his income. It was subsequent misconduct whilst he held that position which placed him in such a difficulty that he thought himself compelled to resign the Service. But he retired with the full pension of a Civil Servant—£1,000 a-year, and it was well known to many that Mr. Tayler, far from being broken in fortune, had always been regarded as a wealthy man, as a man who, after leaving the Civil Service, employed to very great advantage his extraordinary natural abilities as a pleader in the Courts of India. Besides that, Mr. Tayler had never acted towards those with whom he had differences in the spirit of a man who merely sought justice and was anxious to vindicate his reputation. On the contrary, he had assailed Sir Frederick Halliday with a bitterness of feeling which, no doubt, was natural enough in a man who conceived himself to be suffering under a great injustice, and with a prodigality of invective which might move even a temperance orator to envy. This had been going on for 30 years. Every month and every year, Mr. Tayler had been assailing Sir Frederick Halliday in this way. He had pressed into his service the aid of newspapers both in India and this country; he had enlisted on his side historian after historian, and he had obtained testimonials from a large number of distinguished men whom he had besieged with importunities and to whom he had made out a very plausible case. Everyone knew that when they were approached by a man with a grievance they were disposed, either from indolence or from good nature, to say something satisfactory to him, in order that he might not trouble them any longer. This had been the way in which Mr. Taylor had borne himself during the last 30 years, and now they had the whole story re-opened; they were asked to begin again an inquiry which was closed, and which ought to have been put finally on one side when it was disposed of by Lord Stanley, the Secretary of State of 1859. The Under Secretary of State (Sir John Gorst) had gone into the whole story of Mr. Tayler's proceedings at Patna, for some little time before he issued what was now so well known as "the withdrawal order." He (Mr. J. M. Maclean) observed there were cheers from some Members of the House when it was pointed out that Mr. Tayler acted in an insubordinate manner for a long time towards the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal by failing to keep the Lieutenant Governor informed as to what he was going to do. If Mr. Tayler had been the Governor of a Province perfectly isolated from the Government at Calcutta, and had been thrown on his own resources, he would have been justified in acting as Lord Lawrence did in the Punjab, and as Sir Henry Lawrence did in Oude, and as other distinguished men engaged in suppressing the Mutiny acted elsewhere, in making the best of the means at his command. But he was in constant communication by post and electric telegraph with Calcutta. There was no difficulty in communicating with the Lieutenant Governor, and telling him exactly the course of his proceedings. Suppose the Governor of every Province in communication with Calcutta had chosen to do exactly as he liked, and had never let the Lieutenant Governor know what was going on, the whole administration of India would have collapsed. It would have been impossible to have any subordination or any rule whatever. But he (Mr. J. M. Maclean) now came to the withdrawal order, a most important matter in the case. He heard a good deal some years ago about the whole business from Mr. Tayler himself, and he read carefully all the letters and pamphlets which Mr. Tayler submitted to him at that time. He confessed that at that time he was, like many hon. Members, under the belief that Mr. Tayler had perhaps not been very fairly dealt with. Mr. Tayler was such a clever and practised controversialist, and he put his case so plausibly, that, until one looked carefully into the materials on the other side, he was naturally carried away by what he was told. Let the House consider what the withdrawal order which Mr. Taylor issued was. Three Native regiments had mutinied and got away with all their arms, without being attacked by the European troops. They had crossed the river and were besieging Arrah. A detachment of British troops was sent against them, but was defeated with loss, and had to retire on Patna. Immediately, Mr. Tayler, who was a man of eager and impulsive disposition, took the sudden resolution that the whole of the Europeans throughout the Province of Patna ought to abandon their stations and concentrate themselves in Patna. Nor was he satisfied with that, but he addressed a letter to Major Vincent Eyre, who was on his way up the river with a small force, and intended to march to the relief of Arrah from the opposite direction, begging him not to advance. It was said he did not write to Major Vincent Eyre in these specific terms, but he himself said, on August 22, 1857, "I myself and the General, in concurrence with the military authorities, wrote officially to order him not to advance." Now, what was the meaning of an order for the concentration at Patna of all the Europeans at the different stations throughout the Province? It meant the complete abandonment of the heroic little garrison of Arrah to certain destruction by the besieging force of rebels. It meant the determination that no help should be given to any Europeans who remained there. The hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) spoke of the failure of that great general, his father, to advance to Lucknow, and of his writing to Colonel Inglis there, telling him he must do the best he could, as he could not advance further, and, when all his means were exhausted, he must try to cut his way through. But Major Eyre had not tried to advance, and failed. It was not until every effort had been used by Sir Henry Havelock to relieve Lucknow, that he for a time gave up the attempt and fell back to Cawnpore. But this was an order not to attempt relief at all, but to give it up as a bad job and leave our men to be massacred. Look at the disastrous effect of such an order. It was said that Sir Vincent Eyre, some years afterwards, when Mr. Tayler appealed to him, said he thought the letter was justified in the circumstances of the case. Sir Vincent Eyre was a successful and honourable man; he could afford to be magnanimous, and he said that, no doubt, in a spirit of compassion to Mr. Tayler. But the question was not what he said long afterwards, but what he did at the time. Sir Vincent Eyre neglected the order, advanced, dispersed the rebels, and secured the safety of the Province. He (Mr. J. M. Maclean) thought he had said enough to show what a miserable error of judgment this order, which was issued by Mr. Tayler, was; what a terrible example was thus set to Englishmen in authority throughout India at a time when the Empire could only be saved by the constant maintenance of the highest possible standard of public virtue. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) said, "Oh; it was only an error of judgment!" But, surely, it was one of those errors of judgment which the men at the head of the Government of India at that time were bound to punish with the utmost severity, and that was the course which Sir Frederick Halliday, or Lord Canning, acting on Sir Frederick Halliday's advice, pursued. He (Mr. J. M. Maclean) hoped he would be permitted to say a few words with regard to the complaint that Mr. Tayler's appeals had never been heard properly by the Government of India, or by the Council of India in this country. It had been pointed out by the Under Secretary of State (Sir John Gorst), that the Court of Directors confirmed the decision of Lord Canning, and that on an appeal to the Secretary of State, Lord Stanley, in 1859, that decision of the Court of Directors was further confirmed. He could not trace, from the records available to them, that anything more was done until about 10 years afterwards, but about that time a Memorial was presented. It was said that this Memorial was read over by the late Sir Stafford Northcote; that he promised that the Duke of Argyll should deal with the matter, but that nothing more took place. The Under Secretary of State for India said that night that his lips as an official were sealed with regard to the opinions of distinguished men on the other side of the question to that put forward by Mr. Tayler's friends. It so happened he (Mr. J. M. Maclean) had in his possession the opinions of two very distinguished men upon the other side, and as he was an unofficial Member, perhaps he might be permitted, without a breach of secrecy, to make two or three quotations from them. He had before him a Minute, dated November, 1868, and written by Sir Erskine Perry, on the Memorial of Mr. Tayler which was submitted to the India Office in 1868. Sir Erskine Perry went thoroughly into the case, and argued it out from beginning to end. There were many Members of the House who must remember who Sir Erskine Perry was. A fairer minded man never existed; he was an upright, able, and impartial Judge, a man who had been for many years at the head of the High Court of Bombay, and who absolutely knew nothing about the miserable personal feuds in Bengal, which were said to be at the bottom of this dispute. Well, Sir Erskine Perry went into the case, and this was what he gave as his judgment upon it:—

but the question still remained whether he was properly removed. He placed his conduct in every possible light before Her Majesty's Government, with all the skill of a most able and practised writer, and I am sorry to add with all the latitude of expression which an unscrupulous man permits to himself; nevertheless, the decision of such a distinguished lover of justice as Lord Canning was absolutely against him, and to my mind this ought to be conclusive against opening up the inquiry again. But, as it has become necessary to go into the inquiry, I will record here the considerations which a full examination of the case has forced upon me. Sir Frederick Halliday selected Mr. Tayler for the very important post he held at the breaking out of the mutiny, and seems to have passed over some seniors in making the selection. The bias, therefore, of Sir Frederick Halliday towards Mr. Tayler was naturally favourable. This natural bias was disturbed by Mr. Tayler's own conduct. Previously to the breaking out of the mutiny, Mr. Tayler's conduct towards his chief was such as necessarily to destroy all confidence in him, and it deserves to be noted in order to bring home to Indian administrators its full culpability. Mr. Tayler having occupied himself in getting up subscriptions from Natives of rank in behalf of an industrial exhibition, which he assured the Lieutenant Governor was entirely voluntary, complaints reached the ears of the latter that many of these subscriptions had been extorted under the pressure of official coercion; he thereupon directed Mr. Tayler to make inquiry as to the facts, upon which Mr. Tayler sent up all the statements confirming his own account of the transaction, but suppressed all that were unfavourable, and, when these afterwards transpired, he justified having done so. There is little doubt then that, had the mutiny not broken out, Sir Frederick Halliday would have removed him from his post. When the mutiny broke out, we find Mr. Tayler assuring the Lieutenant Governor that Patna was safe, but at the same time advisedly withholding from his chief information of his proceedings, because he chose to consider that Sir Frederick Halliday would have disapproved of them if he had been informed. Such an act of insubordination would also have justified removal from office. It was at this period, when on two separate grounds Sir Frederick Halliday would have been justified in removing Mr. Tayler, that the latter issued the order for calling in Europeans, on which he was actually removed. A recapitulation of these facts shows that no other course was open. As soon as Mr. Tayler was removed his course was equally reprehensible. He resorted to the Press and to pamphleteering in the most outrageous form; he seems to have been the leader in those attacks on Clemency Canning, which so much outraged the English sense of good feeling; he was, I think, somewhat unwisely re-instated in high office—a judicial one—by Sir Frederick Halliday; but the violence of his conduct and unjustifiableness of his attacks again led to his suspension from office by the Supreme Government. I quit the inquiry with the full conviction that no injustice was done him, and that he was a thoroughly untrustworthy public servant.”

Mr. J. M. Maclean .

That was the opinion of Sir Erskine Perry, and there could not be a doubt that the Duke of Argyll had that opinion before him, when he decided that the case could not be re-opened. Then there was a Minute by Sir Henry Maine. He would not trouble the House by quoting from it—it was sufficient to say that the writer took exactly the same view of the case as Sir Erskine Perry did. It was proposed that night that the case should be re-opened, and that a Select Committee of the House of Commons should be appointed to inquire into events which took place 30 years ago. Most of the men who were responsible for what took place could not come forward to give evidence; but it was an extraordinary circumstance that both Sir Frederick Halliday and Mr. Tayler survived at the present day. They were both old men, and he entreated the House to remember that there were two characters at stake in the matter. There was not only at stake the character of Mr. Tayler, but also the character of that distinguished servant of the Government of India, Sir Frederick Halliday. They could not absolve Mr. Tayler from blame, and endorse the accusations he had made against Sir Frederick Halliday, without declaring that a man who had received the thanks of Parliament for his distinguished services must have been one of the basest of human beings, a man who was animated by low personal motives of malignity against Mr. Tayler, and did him the grossest injustice by removing him from the Public Service on that account. He hoped the House of Commons would deal with this question in a thoroughly judicial spirit, that they would appreciate the conduct of successive Governments in determining, after full inquiry, it was impossible to re-open the case; and that, having heard what Mr. Tayler's most eloquent advocates had had to say, they would decide that the case must now be left to the verdict of posterity.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) said, he regretted very much that the Government were unable to see their way to support this Resolution. It seemed to him it was only an act of justice and fairness to Mr. Tayler, who had worked all his life as a Civil servant in India, that there should be an inquiry into his case. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Oldham (Mr. J. M. Maclean) said Mr. Tayler was a man of spirit, and had been able to earn a good deal of money. He had no doubt Mr. Tayler was a man of spirit, and he acted at Patna like a man of spirit. One of the chief charges brought against him was that he had acted with insubordination. It was not shown that Mr. Tayler acted against orders, but merely that he acted without orders, and hon. Gentlemen would remember that in those critical times in India there was no time to send to Calcutta for instructions. Many men were obliged to act on their own responsibility. Mr. Tayler did so, and Patna was perfectly safe during the Mutiny. It was not shown that he acted with any injustice to anybody, but only took certain measures which were necessary for the security of the town and district. He (Mr. Jeffreys) would remind the House that by the Motion they were not asked to decide on the merits of the case. They were not asked to decide whether Mr. Tayler acted rightly or wrongly, but merely to give him an investigation. It would only be an act of justice on the part of the Government to allow an investigation to take place.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he only desired to say a few words before the Division was taken. Generally speaking, under ordinary circumstances, there was nothing fairer or more reasonable than a demand for inquiry; but in the present case the question really was whether the Government were to support their officers in the discharge of their duty. The House was asked to sanction what would really be an inquiry into the conduct of Lord Canning and the Government of India in 1857. Bearing in mind the extracts from Lord Canning's Minute of February 5, 1859, which had been read by the Under Secretary of State for India, he thought there could be no doubt that Lord Canning was at the time anxious to do full justice to Mr. Tayler. Would it be advantageous to the Public Service, and for the good of the State, that, after an interval of 30 years, an inquiry should now be held by the House of Commons? However much hon. Members might sympathize with a gentleman of advanced age, who believed that he had suffered wrong, let them remember that at the time of these occurrences, when all the requisite evidence was procurable, this gentleman was offered an ample judicial inquiry, and deliberately declined the offer. In the circumstances, he submitted that it would not be right for the House to enter upon an investigation of the circumstances of the case.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 184; Noes 20: Majority 164.—(Div. List, No. 155.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, the sum of £5,570,712 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

CUSTOMS (WINE DUTY) BILL.

[BILL 293.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short Title).

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, on going through the clauses, he found that the Bill dealt only with sparkling wines, and had for its object the imposition of a differential duty on wines of a cheaper kind—wines of a character and nature which, as a medical man, he could not but think the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be wiser to tax heavily, while allowing the pure productions of the juice of the grape to be introduced free of duty. With that, however, he could not now deal; he only now suggested that, inasmuch as this was a Bill for imposing a duty on sparkling wines, it would be in the interest of accuracy if the word "sparkling" were introduced in the parenthesis.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

DR. TANNER said, he really must press for an answer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen) (St. George's,

Mr. W. H. Smith

Hanover Square) said, he did not wish to be discourteous to the hon. Member, but he really thought the hon. Member's remarks were rather good humoured banter than in support of a seriously proposed Amendment. It was an Amendment he was unable to accept. The Bill had been carefully drafted, and in reference to the remarks on the character of the cheaper wines it would be observed that the proposition had no relation to the alcoholic strength or purity of the wines.

DR. TANNER said, after that explanation he would not press the matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 2 (Duty on sparkling wines in bottle).

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven) said, he had an Amendment to this clause, to omit the words "sparkling wine imported in bottle." That would bring back the proposal to the form it assumed when it was originally put before the House. On the previous night, he made a few observations on the second reading, and called his right hon. Friend's attention to the fact that the wine trade generally approved of the original proposal, and could see no reason why "still" wines should be exempted from the duty. He would not pretend to speak on the subject with any authority himself; but he had had the opportunity of conversing with leading members of the association which represented nearly all the principal wine traders in the country, and he was able to say in their name, as to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman on their action in regard to light wines, that the effect of the alteration of duty, as the Bill proposed, would be to give encouragement to the adulteration of still wines in this country. His right hon. Friend last night committed himself to the proposition that it would be of advantage to the consumer if still wines were imported in bottle; but for reasons supplied by the authorities he had referred to, and from the opinions of experts, he was able to say that the proposition of his right hon. Friend was entirely fallacious, and that no consumer of the cheaper light wines would have suffered from the legislation proposed by his right hon. Friend. There was no doubt whatever that all the poor wines that were imported, whether from France, Germany, or Italy, could be best imported in cask.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman on a point of Order. The point is one of very considerable nicety; but this clause carries out a Resolution passed in Committee of Ways and Means, authorizing the imposition of 2*s.* 6*d.* a gallon on sparkling wines. Before that there had been a duty of 5*s.* a dozen on all wines; but, inasmuch as the duty being imposed by the gallon, increases the duty on wines imported in larger bottles, it is impossible to go beyond the Resolution passed in Committee of Ways and Means. If sparkling wines were struck out, it would impose on magnums, jereboams and larger bottles, a greater duty than is now levied; the Amendment therefore cannot be moved.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he regretted that that ruling had not been given earlier; it would have saved his occupation of the time of the Committee. Accepting the decision, he had only to say that he should support the next Amendment, if moved by the hon. Member for Kilmarnock.

MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.) said, his Amendment was aimed at that seriously objectionable principle in the Bill, the establishment of an ad valorem duty in our Customs regulations. He was quite sure that the scheme as embodied in the Bill for imposing a differential duty of 2*s.* 6*d.* a-gallon, or 5*s.* a dozen, in addition to the present duty on expensive wines, and establishing a lower duty of 2*s.* on wines under 30*s.* value, would open the door to a great deal of fraud, which he did not see how it was possible for the Customs to check. He was quite sure that shippers would ship "green" wines, possibly unfit for sale at a high price at the moment, but which would after an interval be worth 60*s.* or 70*s.* But they would be invoiced at 30*s.* a-dozen, or 15*s.* a-gallon, and he did not see how the Customs Authorities could check the practice. Of course, they might be tested; but, still, he defied the Chancellor of the Exchequer to tell the Committee how there would not still be open the means of fraud of a very serious character. What was quite as bad was that while fair traders would be subject to a disadvantage, unscrupulous traders would gain an advantage on wines that in the course of a year or two would be worth 50*s.* or 60*s.* a-dozen, but which would be imported as costing 28*s.* or 30*s.* The honest trader's invoice would fairly state the value of the "green" wines; but not so the invoices of the unscrupulous shippers. How could the Customs apply a test? The invoices would be produced, and evidence would be given, all in perfect order. Unfortunately, he had had some experience of what was possible, and what had been done in invoicing. Foreign merchants entered into keen competition with us, and much as was said about the progress of Continental trade, he was afraid that much was done by unscrupulous invoicing and the defrauding of Customs abroad. He felt sure that the Government proposal would work injuriously to the fair trader, and with no advantage to the Revenue of the country. His proposal was that instead of a duty of 5*s.* a-dozen on the better class wines in addition to the existing duty, and 2*s.* on the common wines, to place a duty of 4*s.* all round. He was quite sure that the fair traders, even when importers of cheap wines about 30*s.* would rather pay 4*s.* than be subjected to the risk of unscrupulous competition. For that, and a variety of other causes, he begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice. Should it commend itself to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would, probably derive from it a larger revenue than from the Bill as it stood. As a natural consequence, Clause 3 would come out, and the other Amendments would fall to the ground.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, after the word "bottle," to insert the words "in bond, bottles, and in cases, or other packages."—(Mr. Stephen Williamson.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, as he understood the proposition of the hon. Gentleman, it was to impose a duty of 4*s.* a-dozen on all wines. [Mr. S. WILLIAMSON: All sparkling wines.] The duty would be 4*s.* on Saumur and cheap wines of about the price of 20*s.*, as well as on the high priced Champagnes. But the general view of the House, so far as he had been able to gather it, was that a heavy duty should not be imposed on cheap wines; that it would not be wise to handicap cheap wines in the manner suggested. He was aware that there was on the part of a large portion of the trade an anxiety to have a heavy duty put upon cheap wines. Importers of high-class wines viewed with great disfavour the importation of cheap wines at 24s. or 30s. a-dozen, and were annoyed somewhat that a change in duty should enable these cheap wines to be introduced without the penalty of the same duty as was paid on the dearer wines. He did not wish to argue the question at length, for he considered it was more or less decided by the previous debate; but, of course, if the hon. Member desired to press his Amendment, he would be prepared to meet him and maintain the contention that the cheaper wines should not be excluded or handicapped by a heavy duty. He did not know whether the hon. Member put forward his proposition simply to avoid the ad valorem principle, or whether he shared the feeling of hostility existing in some quarters to these cheap wines; but he rather gathered it was because the hon. Member felt the difficulty of levying an ad valorem duty, that he desired to make the duty uniform? [Mr. S. WILLIAMSON assented.] Then he would address himself to the argument of the difficulty of ascertaining the value. The hon. Member suggested a mode of fraud or evasion of duty by shipping wine in a green state, when it would be worth 30s., and then waiting until it had matured to its full quality, and that commended itself to his hon. Friend also (Sir Robert Fowler) who was somewhat hostile to the Bill. A very important question here arose connected with Champagne, whether the wine would develop as well in its green state in cellars in England as in the Champagne country? He had inquired carefully into the matter, and could re-assure the hon. Gentleman. If green Champagne—unripe Champagne—were immediately shipped in the state described, the result would be that the wine would be spoiled. Champagne had to be treated with the greatest delicacy in its earlier stages. It had to be kept at a particular temperature in vaults specially constructed for the purpose by the great Champagne houses. The wine would spoil in the bonded warehouses of this country. There was the strongest evidence that the wine must be so kept for two or three years in France. The wines of 1884-5 were being now imported; but the vintage of 1887 could not be shipped now for the purpose of escaping the difference between the 5s. and 2s. duty. The higher temperature to which the new wine would be subjected in transit to this country would lead to much loss through the bursting of bottles; a loss to the merchant much more serious than the amount of the duty he could expect to evade. This had been considered. Champagne required special treatment beyond that of any other wine to develop its full quality. The great houses who shipped Champagne were not going to degrade the commodity in which they dealt by attempting to introduce it below its value. They had built up the reputation of their wines at an enormous expense of capital and trouble over a long series of years, and he was not prepared to admit for a moment that it would be to their interest, even if they were all rogues and wished to evade the tax, to attempt devices that would probably spoil their wines, degrade their reputation in the market, and cause them infinitely more loss than the gain they could hope to secure in the attempts.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) said, he was sorry to hear the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he might say that in his constituency (London) the original proposition was received with great satisfaction, and great regret was expressed when the right hon. Gentleman deviated from his original purpose, and made the alteration the Committee were now discussing. There was a general feeling—it had been pointed out to himself, and no doubt similar representations had been made to the right hon. Gentleman—that it would be very difficult to meet the question of duty on wines above and below 30s., and that it would lead to a good deal of fraud on the Customs. He certainly concurred in the view of the hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. S. Williamson) that a uniform duty on all sparkling wines would be a much better plan than an ad valorem duty, such as was proposed in the Bill. He very much regretted that the alteration had been made. He knew there was a good deal of cavil at the original proposition, and that this Bill was brought in in pursuance of a pledge given to right hon. Gentlemen opposite; but it was much to be regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had run from his guns.

MR. BARING (London) said, he was sorry to say he did not entirely agree with anybody who had spoken in the discussion. He did not agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. S. Williamson), for he was not opposed to an ad valorem duty; but as he did not agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman below the Gangway was out of Order, he was bound to vote for that before the Committee. He did not see why this particular change should be made in favour of what he considered the most unwholesome drink anybody could put down their throats; therefore, if the hon. Member for Kilmarnock went to a Division, he should vote with him.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, a misconception had taken possession of the mind of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen), if he supposed the wine trade were at all opposed to the consumption of cheap wines. What they said was that there ought not to be the vast difference sought to be established between the two qualities, and why should this differential duty be established against sparkling wines? He believed the trade got a larger profit out of cheap wines than from dear wines; but they felt that the present proposal created a large difference of treatment absolutely without precedent. For instance, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said Saumur and other cheap wines should have an advantage; but why not apply the same principle to Sherry and Maderia? Maderia, it might be said, cost 5s. or 6s. a-bottle; but then the consumer, who could not afford Maderia, bought Marsala, and an excellent cheap wine it was, costing 2s. or 2s. 6d. Why, again, when the ordinary duty on wines was the same, should particular wines be surtaxed on a different principle? That was an argument that had considerable weight with him, and which induced him to support the Amendment. The hon. Member who proposed the Amendment referred to frauds that might possibly be carried out, and surely he had reason on his side. He would put a case to the Chancellor of the Exchequer which, perhaps, his financial genius could explain. Suppose a Champagne worth 32s. a-dozen. If that Champagne were imported and declared to be of that value, it would be subject to a surtax of 5s., raising the price to 37s. But if the dealer dropped 2s. from the original price, and declared it of the value of 30s., he would only have to pay 2s. duty, so, therefore, according to the great authority of Cocker, the importer would make 1s. a-dozen on the transaction, for, while he would lose 2s. on the wine, he would save 3s. on the duty. That was one case out of many that might be proposed; but, without detaining the Committee further, he did not hesitate to tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the leaders in the trade who were interested in the trade being fairly conducted were in favour of a uniform duty, and the proposal of the hon. Member seemed to be a fair one, though the particular sum to be fixed might be a matter for subsequent consideration. But it was perfectly clear that the gross inequality of the system would never be got rid of, and there would be no check to fraud until an analogous proposal was adopted.

MR. S. WILLIAMSON said, in using the words "green wine," he did not mean wine of last year's growth, which he knew would be in an unfit state to ship, but wine of two or three years old which it would be impossible for the Custom House officers to value. It could not be denied that the door was opened to fraud. The honest trader would invoice his wine two or three years old, and which would be valuable two or three years later, fairly at 32s. or 33s. a-dozen; but his trade might be ruined by the less scrupulous man who declared the value at 29s., securing a difference of 10 per cent.

MR. WILLIAM LOWTHER (Westmoreland, Appleby) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined to put that Question.

MR. GOSCHEN said, there was no such fear of injury to the honest trader. Hon. Members surely were aware that the general price of Champagne was, unfortunately, such that the difference to the consumer of 3s. a-dozen, on this expensive wine would not be such as greatly to affect the merchant one way or the other. The great bulk of Champagne came to England, even after two or three years, at a much higher price than 30s. All the great houses who imported wines of well known brands, "Moët and Chandon," "Cliquot," and other great firms, shipped wines worth for the most part much more than 30s. Here and there there might be a small proportion of wines the price of which might fluctuate about the dividing limit; but he did not believe the honest trader would suffer the loss suggested. The wines coming in of about the value of 30s. bore a very small proportion indeed to the whole. That was the answer to his right hon. Friend the Member for Whitehaven.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked, was he to understand that the main object and intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to tax the true and good Champagne highly, and at the same time admit, on more favourable terms, the deleterious, he might almost say poisonous, compounds such as Chante, Barolo, or the villanous spirituous Asti Spumante—he really could not stigmatize it strongly enough? If the Bill passed, it should contain provisions for securing that some so-called wines should bear labels conveying similar warnings of their poisonous nature as was attached to some bottles sent out by the apothecary.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he had no particular acquaintance with the decoctions mentioned by the hon. Member; but he could tell him that there were many of the wines of the Saumur class which were not deleterious, which were agreeable, and which were largely consumed by a portion of the community in this country who could not afford more expensive wines. These wines were perfectly wholesome, though they might not commend themselves to the more educated palates accustomed to wines of a higher class.

DR. TANNER imagined that the right hon. Gentleman's acquaintance with them had not been of a personal nature.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 110: Majority 53.—(Div. List, No. 156.)

MR. S. WILLIAMSON said, that, seeing what the opinion of the Committee was, he would not proceed with the next Amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Reduction of duty).

Mr. Goschen

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said, the hour was late, many Members had had a long day's duty, and it was evident from the Notice Paper that the remaining clauses would meet with considerable opposition. The new Rules, he always understood, were devised in a humane spirit, to enable Members to go home in reasonable time, and he would suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should avail himself of another opportunity to proceed further.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Dr. Tanner.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press the Motion. He was as anxious as anyone not to prolong the Sitting; but he was afraid hon. Members had been a little spoiled by easy hours under the new Rules, and the hour was early compared with the experience of former Sessions. He might urge that which might have some influence with the hon. Member, at all events it had with himself, that it was important to the trade that this matter should be settled. The duty could not be altered until the Bill passed; and though the longer it was delayed the longer the Revenue received the higher duty, it was only fair to the trade to terminate a state of uncertainty, and come to a decision as soon as possible.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) said, he only wished to say that a leading member of the trade had, in conversation that day, strongly urged the postponement of the Bill.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he could not agree with the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and would remind the right hon. Gentleman that some Members had been in attendance on Committees or in the House since half-past 11, and had also paid close attention to the discussion of the Local Government (England and Wales) Bill. He also reminded the right hon. Gentleman that when the question was raised on a previous occasion, the House was asked particularly to postpone discussion to the clauses. [Mr. Goschen: To the second reading.] He did not know what discussion there might have been then; but it was only in Committee that questions of detail could be adequately dealt with. He was strongly opposed to the exemption of Money Bills from the Rule closing Business at a certain hour; they were just the Bills that ought not to be urged forward for an unlimited time.

DR. TANNER said, he thought some consideration should be shown to Members, who by making a House, had enabled any progress to be made with the Bill. It would be wise, and, indeed, only reasonable, to yield to the wish that had been expressed from both sides, instead of sitting late to further a Bill which, it seemed, would not benefit the Revenue, and certainly would not benefit those who swallowed the Chancellor of the Exchequer's bad champagne.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 107: Majority 61.—(Div. List, No. 157).

MR. S. WILLIAMSON said, the object of his Amendment he now moved would be apparent. It was that it might be distinctly understood that the invoice price must include the cost of packing.

Amendment proposed, in line 25, after the word "gallon," to insert the words "in bond, bottled, and in cases or other packages."—(Mr. Stephen Williamson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, the object of the hon. Member would be met by an Amendment to Clause 8, by inserting in line 30, after "customs," the words "but including freight and all other charges." He had consulted with the legal advisers of the Customs, and they believed that these words would make it quite clear that the price included all those charges.

MR. S. WILLIAMSON said, that would scarcely meet his object. Clause 8 referred to two classes of invoices; first, to wine imported by the consumer, and paid for by him; but the words proposed would exclude the other part of the clause.

MR. JACKSON believed the Amendment would apply to both cases.

MR. S. WILLIAMSON said, he was not sure that the Amendment specifically met the point. It was his intention, however, to vote against the clause.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said, he would appeal to the Government to allow the matter to rest for the present. When the Government called upon the House to give them an extra Morning Sitting, surely it was not desirable to choose the occasion for putting down a Money Bill, by means of which the Sitting could be prolonged for an indefinite time. The least that should be done was to avoid making the Sitting unusually late as well as unusually early. He would rather not make a Motion to report Progress; but unless the Government yielded to the protest he must do so.

MR. GOSCHEN said, looking at the remaining Amendments in the light of decisions arrived at, he did not think they need give rise to long discussion. They were Amendments to omit clauses containing the substance of the Bill which had already been discussed and decided. He admitted the force of the objection urged by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and he was sure his right hon. Friend the Leader of the House would not wish to persevere if there was any general desire for a long discussion. But, at the same time, he reminded the Committee that the alternative was to resume the Bill at a late hour on another night. [Cries of "No!" and "Why?"] The course of the Local Government Bill could not be interrupted, and the Rules of the House permitted the continuation of this Bill after 12. But the Government had every desire to be conciliatory, and would not press the Committee now beyond the present Amendment if there was a strong desire against doing so. In the interest of the trade, however, it would be well to terminate the period of uncertainty, and to resume the discussion on Monday would be to again prolong the Sitting. The balance of convenience was certainly in favour of going on now.

MR. BARING (London) said, if the Bill were set down as First Order on Monday there would be no difficulty in getting it through, and then other Business could be proceeded with.

MR. WADDY suggested that, inasmuch as the time of the House was practically at the disposal of the Government, there would be no difficulty in taking a little of the time intended for the Local Government (England and Wales) Bill, remembering how materially the Government had lightened the latter Bill by the determination to omit clauses that would have consumed much time and given much trouble.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he should be exceedingly glad to meet the wish expressed from both sides; but he was under a pledge, repeated only at Question time, to proceed with the Local Government (England and Wales) Bill day by day as the principal Government Business. It would be for the convenience of the House to proceed now; but he did not wish to press that, though he was sure it would save time to do so.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.) said, he came down to a Committee at half-past 11, and should do so again on Monday, and he urged the Government to persevere and finish the Bill now. It could easily be done, not much debatable matter was left, and it would be preferable to having another late Sitting on Monday.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.) said, that from 2 o'clock the Government had had practically the whole time of the House at their disposal, with the exception of an interval in which a supporter of the Government ventilated a supposed grievance. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members on the other side had an equal right with his own Party to have or invent grievances. It would be only reasonable now for the Government to conform to the spirit of their own Rule—that Business should cease at 1 o'clock. He had no objection to the Bill, and in the last Division upon it gave his vote in favour of the Government. Let the Government make the Bill first Order on one of their own days, or even take it last, and perhaps the Committee would be more disposed to go on with it.

MR. CONYBEARE said, the effect of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's argument in favour of the trade interest failed when one of his supporters, who seemed to be a spokesman for the trade, informed the Committee that the trade were anxious the Bill should be postponed. Seeing also that, on the other hand, as time ran on, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had the advantage of the higher duty levied, there was no necessity for pressing the Bill with unusual celerity.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) urged the Government to act up to the spirit of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's remarks, and defer to the strong desire for adjournment expressed on both sides.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. WADDY said, when he made his appeal to the Government he stated that, unless that appeal were responded to, he should be impelled to make a Motion to report Progress. To bring the matter to a crisis he would now move it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Waddy.)

MR. GOSCHEN said, he would suggest to the hon. and learned Member that he should withdraw that Motion, and allow the Committee to take the clause. Then, if hon. Members insisted, he would not contest the Motion any longer. He had promised representatives of the trade to bring the matter to an issue as soon as possible, and he regretted that the state of uncertainty should continue.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston) said, the clause would give rise to considerable discussion. The right hon. Gentleman had been reasonable and conciliatory in his remarks when he referred to the alternative of sitting late on Monday. But the inconvenience to Members would be less on Monday, than on Friday at the end of a week's work.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, he was very sorry the Government had given way. They might be assured that they would find themselves in the same position on Monday night. The Committee might make up its mind that it would then be too late to proceed with the Bill any night after 12. A proposition had been made to put the Bill in front of the Local Government (England and Wales) Bill; but he submitted that that Bill had not made such extraordinary progress as to justify that.

DR. TANNER rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," and negatived, Question again proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he was surprised the Chancellor of the Exchequer should say no serious question remained, for he had Notice of a Motion to omit the clause in relation to which questions arose as to which no explanation had been given by either the right hon. Gentleman or the Secretary to the Treasury. The clause provided that where it was proved to the satisfaction of the Customs that the market value of any wine imported in bottle was not more than 5s. a-gallon duty should be levied as proposed. He did not wish to go over old ground again; but he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to state to the Committee how it was proposed to establish the value of a wine. There had been no indication of the method how that interesting task was to be executed. He was told by authorities in the trade, that it was impossible to do it, that no agent of the Customs would be equal to the task. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was, then, in an unfortunate position. If the right hon. Gentleman had stuck to his original proposition all would have been plain sailing; but he deliberately walked into the pitfall prepared for him by right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who then left him in his difficulty. Members of the trade declared that it was extremely difficult to distinguish the relative value of wines a little above and a little below 30s., and common sense would incline one to accept that statement. He was told that an experienced expert found it next to impossible to distinguish between two bottles of Champagne valued at 30s. and 32s. How then would the Customs Authorities prove to their satisfaction that a wine was worth a little less or a little more than 30s. a-dozen?

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not wish to imply that no opposition remained to the Bill. He said there were no Amendments, except to do away with clauses altogether. In reply to his right hon. Friend, it was not proposed to test the wine by a taster trying every bottle. He could understand that no palate, however highly trained, could distinguish between wines at 30s. and 32s. What he proposed was that documents should be forthcoming, such as invoices and bills of lading, and that a statutory declaration should be made when any wine claimed to come in under the lower rate of duty. He refused to believe that the great majority of the trade in this country were going to enter into a combination for carrying out a system of wholesale fraud upon the Customs. There would be heavy penalties for false description, and there would be the risk of confiscation if false declarations were made. He admitted there might be a difficulty with regard to wine just about the border line of 30s.; but there would be no difficulty in the case of at least two-thirds of the Champagne imported, for there would be documentary proof with regard to the price. Careful forms of declaration would be drawn up; but his right hon. Friend need not fear that the Customs were going to embark in the extremely troublesome and difficult task of deciding the value of a wine by tasting.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked did he understand his right hon. Friend to say that the value of a wine would be determined by documentary evidence?

MR. GOSCHEN said, great latitude would be given to Custom House officers, and if there was reason to suspect fraud, of course there would be an opportunity of testing the wine. The attempt to pass a wine unfairly at 30s. would be attended with much risk of loss, and his right hon. Friend's knowledge of the trade and study of the subject generally would show him that of the great majority of Champagnes, the brands were fairly known, and none of the great and well-known houses would attempt to introduce wines at a low price when their value in the majority of cases was well known.

Question put, and agreed to Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES)

(SPECIAL REPORT).

Ordered, That the Committee of Selection have leave to make a Special Report.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY accordingly reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure; Mr. Dugdale; and had appointed in substitution: Mr. Kynoch.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY further reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had added to the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure, the following Fifteen Members in respect of the Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen Bill: Mr. Abraham (Glamorgan-shire), Mr. Ainslie, Mr. Aird, Mr. Barnes, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Donald Crawford, Mr. William Crawford, Sir Donald Currie, Mr. Davenport, Mr. George Elliot, Sir William Ewart, Mr. Fenwick, Mr. Gill, Mr. MacInnes, and Mr. Royden.

Report to lie upon the Table.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock till Monday next.

HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY THE LATE GERMAN EMPEROR.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY), who rose amid deep silence, the Members of the House uncovering, said: My Lords, I rise to move that an Address be presented to Her Majesty expressive of the sympathy of this House at the great calamity under which She is suffering, and also that an Address be presented to Her Imperial Majesty the Empress of Germany expressing to Her Imperial Majesty our deep condolence. My Lords, we offer the expression of our sympathy and condolence, but there is no cause that we should enter largely into the grounds that move us, or dwell much upon the calamity that is leading us to this action; for the sorrow which is felt for the death of the Emperor of Germany, and the praises of his life, are in every mouth and are written in a thousand columns. My Lords, Her Majesty may well feel the deepest grief at the loss that has overtaken her. Grief at a bereavement, at a loss, is proportionate to the expectations that have been legitimately formed; and never were expectations formed more sanguinely, or with more apparent justification, than the expectations which attended the future career of the Emperor who is borne to his grave to-day. It seems as though there had been accumulated upon his head every possible qualification for a life of glorious, splendid, and peaceful usefulness. Great experience, true aptitude and courage in war, high reputation for culture and for knowledge in the arts of peace, a deep and well-understood sympathy for all the highest and best aspirations of his people, the support of a consort never surpassed in her ability or in her affection and constant enthusiasm for right—all these things seemed to fit him for a career of power and splendid capacity for good, a career that might well have been as prolonged as that of his illustrious father. All these expectations have been dashed by an inscrutable decree. We can only bow to it, and offer our deep sympathy to his Royal relatives for their lamentable loss, and to the Government and people of Germany for the bereavement of a ruler upon whom such high hopes were set. But even with his short reign he has left an example that we may cherish. He has shown under circumstances of singular trial the indomitable spirit by which his race has made the greatness of Germany and its own. He has shown a steady courage which even the grip of a fell disease could never daunt, and a devotion to his duty in circumstances which would have led meaner natures to the abandonment of all hope. He died at his post with the devotion of a soldier, under circumstances which gave none of the encouragement that lightens the soldier's fall. He has left an example which may be of most precious value, not only to Sovereigns who may follow him, but to all sorts and conditions of men; and it is with a feeling that we are performing no act of mere formality in rendering homage to one of the highest and noblest natures that ever adorned a Throne that I move the Addresses that I have now the honour of laying on the Table.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to second this Motion, but I can add nothing to the eloquent, pathetic, and unexaggerated remarks which have fallen from the noble Marquess. If it be true, as has been written, that—“Death loves a shining mark, a signal blow,” seldom has a more shining mark been presented at which death has struck such a blow. The late Emperor was a skilled and daring soldier. His bravery in the field was equalled by the serene courage with which he endured sufferings under most trying circumstances. Both in his military and in his civilian life a high sense of duty was his constant guide. To say of the departed great that they were without faults seems to be vulgar, unmeaning flattery, which cannot be quite true; and yet, having had opportunities during the last 37 years, in Germany, Prussia, and in this country, of closely observing the late Emperor, I could not, even if I wished, recall any defects which marred his straightforward, noble character. This is not an occasion on which to make any political allusions. In my position I could not make any with authority; but yet it is difficult not to give some expression to the general feeling as to the great loss that has accrued to Germany from a limit of some short 14 weeks having been assigned to the reign of this strong, upright, kind-hearted man—one who from his hereditary qualities, his early education, and his constant self-training had given such unusual, such certain promise of being a beneficent Ruler of the great Empire to the creation of which he had so largely contributed. It is not easy to pay a greater tribute of praise to a Sovereign who has passed away than the intense regret which has been felt, not only in Germany, not only in this country, where there are reasons for it which it would be superfluous to repeat, not only in the United States, where so many of his countrymen reside, but in Italy, where till lately the German was not popular, in Russia, and especially in France, where there has been such a full acknowledgment of the merits of one who had lately been their successful but generous foe. May we not hope that this fact may lead to kindlier international feelings? Will your Lordships bear with me if I add that, while we greatly deplore the loss of this strong guarantee of European peace, it seems to me that there is no solid ground for the conviction expressed in some quarters as to the certain occurrence of a state of things which the late Emperor would have so deeply deplored? The noble Marquess has strongly expressed—it was impossible for him to express too strongly—the deep sympathy with which we approach our Queen on the loss of such a son-in-law, of one so near and dear to her. It is needless for him or for me to say that that feeling extends in the fullest degree to the Empress Victoria, Her Majesty's first-born child. The people of this country have followed with deep interest the career of Her Imperial Majesty. They have rejoiced at the 30 years of unmixed domestic happiness which she has enjoyed. They have been proud of the wide-world reputation which her character, her attainments, and her exceptional intellectual powers have created for her. They have been deeply touched by the courage, the dignity, and the devotion with which Her Imperial Majesty has tended the sick bed and the death bed of the remarkable man who appreciated and loved her so well, and they fervently trust that God will give her strength to bear the overwhelming blow that has befallen her. I beg to second the Motion.

Moved, “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to express the deep sorrow of this House at the great loss which Her Majesty has sustained by the death of His Imperial Majesty Frederick, German Emperor;

King of Prussia, and to condole with Her Majesty on this melancholy occasion :

To assure Her Majesty that this House will ever feel the warmest interest in whatever concerns Her Majesty's domestic relations, and to declare the ardent wishes of this House for the happiness of Her Majesty and of Her family."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On Question, agreed to, nemine dissente.

Ordered, that the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

Moved to resolve—

"That this House do condole with Her Imperial Majesty Victoria, German Empress, Queen of Prussia, Princess Royal of Great Britain and Ireland, on the great loss which she has sustained by the death of His Imperial Majesty."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On Question, agreed to, nemine dissente.

Ordered, that a message of condolence be sent to Her Imperial Majesty, and that the Lord Chancellor do communicate the said message to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, with a request that he will attend the Empress Victoria for the purpose of conveying it to Her Imperial Majesty.

Moved to resolve—

"That this House desire to express their profound sympathy with the Imperial and Royal Family and with the Government and people of Germany."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On Question, agreed to, nemine dissente.

HOUSE OF LORDS (LIFE PEERS) BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of Salisbury): My Lords, I rise to draw your attention to a subject which has already occupied your Lordships during the present Session—namely, the constitution of this House, and I am going to lay upon the Table a Bill with respect to it; but, warned by the fate of my Predecessors, my efforts will be exceedingly modest. I shall indulge in none of those far-reaching schemes whose ambitious character has been their destruction. The first provision to which I will call attention is the question of Life Peers. It is not a new one in this House. It has been considered on more than one occasion, and it is not new to myself, for when I first came to the House, some 20 years ago, I had the honour of supporting Lord Russell in connection with a measure not very dissimilar from that which I shall propose this evening. The fate of that measure was curious. During the discussion there was no great difference of opinion as to the desirability of a moderate and carefully guarded power of creating Life Peers to be placed in the hands of the Ministry. But though the Bill, with expressions of good-will more or less accentuated, passed the second reading and afterwards through Committee, where it was modified, when it came to the third reading it was met by resistance on the part of the Chiefs of the Party then in Opposition. But the ground taken by the Opposition for resisting it at that time was not an objection to the principle of the measure, as may be seen by referring to the speech of Lord Cairns, who was then the Leader of the Opposition. His ground for resisting the Bill was that owing to delays which had occurred, and which appear to have arisen from a cause with which we are not familiar—namely, the enormous amount of Business which there was in the House at the time, the measure had been delayed until the end of the Summer, when there was no hope that it could pass through the House of Commons in the same Session. Lord Cairns took a strong objection at that time, an objection which he repeated three or four years ago, shortly before his death—to bringing forward a measure of this kind unless there was some very fair reason to hope that it could pass into law during the current Session. The only criticism that I really fear in bringing forward this measure is that some people may think that the time of its introduction infringes the rule which Lord Cairns sought to lay down; but I am happy to say that my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury assures me that he can pass the Bill if it goes down to the House of Commons, and that considerations of mere time will not stand in its way. The great question in connection with all these Bills is the amount and nature of the restriction that should be placed upon the Ministers of the Crown in the exercise of the power of creating Life Peers. But for the necessity of some such restriction I do not think there ever would have been any doubt or difficulty as to the adoption of the measure. In the earliest history of this House Life Peers were exceedingly common, and they continued to be made from time to time down to what we may call the end of the first stage in the history of the House of Lords, down to the end of the Wars of the Roses. You may take that to be a break, as it were, in the history of the House of Lords, because when they re-assembled after the battle of Bosworth there were found to be only 29 lay Peers in existence. Down to that time a considerable number of Life Peers were made; but there was this peculiarity about several of those creations—they were not made by the sole Prerogative of the Crown, but they were made in Parliament with the consent of Parliament, so that even then it was thought that the exercise of such a Prerogative ought not to proceed unchecked. That is the consideration to which we have to address ourselves to-day, and it has always been in my mind one of the most indispensable conditions of any legislation of this kind that the extent to which it should be exercised should be distinctly limited by Parliament beforehand. Otherwise the existence of the power might be fatal to the independence of your Lordships' House. If there was a power of creating Life Peers to an unlimited extent, the temptation would inevitably be too strong for some ambitious and imperious Minister, and he would attempt by such creations to force the decision of the House, as it was once forced in 1712. I know that the noble Earl opposite who leads the Opposition has said again and again that he does not understand why there is more necessity for restriction in the case of Life Peers than in the case of Hereditary Peers. It is very difficult to convey it to the noble Earl's mind if it does not occur to him instinctively, but I am quite sure that most of your Lordships will recognize that anybody would feel much more responsible in advising an unlimited creation of Hereditary Peers than in advising an unlimited creation of Life Peers. Not only would he feel much more responsibility, but he would have much more difficulty in inducing the Sovereign to accept his advice, and he would have much more difficulty in obtaining the support and approval of public opinion in such a course. As your Lordships know, the creation of Hereditary Peers for the purpose of influencing the decision of the House of Lords has only been resorted to once. It was at the very commencement of our Parliamentary history, and it was done for the purpose of passing the Resolutions which were necessary in connection with the Treaty of Utrecht. Only 12 Peers were created, and yet, for creating those 12 Peers, among other things, Lord Oxford was impeached by the House of Commons as having done a thing which was derogatory to the honour of Parliament and fatal to the public interests. That was one of the chapters of the impeachment afterwards drawn against Lord Oxford. It was never done again, although it was threatened once on a memorable occasion. Lord Brougham has expressed his great doubt whether, if matters had come to an issue, that course would ultimately have been taken; and if my memory serves me right, the Duke of Richmond has stated that he had it from his father, who was in the Cabinet at the time, that he would never have consented to go to that extreme. It is, therefore, a measure from which Ministers have obviously flinched, and I am dwelling on the point for the purpose of reminding your Lordships that they have flinched from it, and that the threat of it has been very rare. I think I have seen it stated in a book of which, on account of its authority, I should always speak with great respect—I mean Professor Dicey's Constitutional Law—that it is settled Constitutional Law that when the House of Lords resists the House of Commons the vote of the former should be decided by the creation of Peerages; but I think that Constitutional Law requires general acceptance and the acceptance of both sides in politics: and I can safely say that no such doctrine has ever been accepted by the Conservative Party. I am dwelling upon this for the purpose of pointing out that Lord Brougham, who may be said to have been a good judge, stated that if it had been a question of the creation, not of Hereditary Peers, but of Life Peers, very much less difficulty would have existed, and much less apprehension would have been felt, and Ministers would have resolved upon the step with very much greater ease. I, therefore, think it abolutely necessary that we should establish narrow limits within which this power should be exercised, for whatever the destiny of this House may be, whatever you may desire that it should do or not do, whatever powers it should wield, or character it should bear, I am sure that no man of common sense would ever wish that it should become the supple instrument of a Minister of the Crown. But I go further. I say nothing at present as to the number to which the creation of Life Peers should be restricted, but I think the creation ought to be restricted in point of nature and kind. Fears have been expressed that if unrestricted power of creating Life Peers were given to a Minister it might be used simply for the purpose of getting rid of applicants who could be got rid of in no other way, or for the purpose of disposing of Members of the other House whose presence was inconvenient. Now, I have the greatest possible respect for that Corporation generally represented by Lord Kintore. I have great respect for the valuable services they render to the country, but I am anxious to eliminate to the utmost possible degree their influence in the creation of any Life Peers for the future. If Life Peerages are to be a useful institution, they ought to have as little to do with the Whips as can be. I will state what the proposals are that we have to make. We propose that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty from time to time by Letters Patent to appoint a Peer during his life "any person qualified as shown hereinafter," and then come certain categories which I will read. Of these not more than three persons shall be appointed in any one calendar year. Either he must have been for not less than two years a Judge of the Superior Court in some part of the United Kingdom, or have served in Her Majesty's Naval Forces and have obtained the rank of Rear Admiral or higher rank, or he must have served in Her Majesty's Land Forces, and have attained to the rank of Major General or higher rank, or have been an Ambassador Extraordinary. These categories deal with the legal, military, naval, and diplomatic professions. With respect to the Civil Service there is a difference. There is no rank or mark like that of Ambassador, or Major General, or Rear Admiral which you can select as showing their merit or their experience. But it appeared to us that the requisite security might be obtained by relying upon a Body whose constitution has received an expression of admiration from the noble Earl—I mean the Privy Council. I do not think Ministers are generally disposed to appoint unfit persons to the Privy Council, and I think we may say that if a man has been in the Civil Service of the Crown either in this Country or in the Colonies, and has afterwards been made a Privy Councillor, that he is a fit person for a Life Peerage; and, besides that, we propose that any person who may have been five years a Governor General or a Governor in any part of Her Majesty's Dominions out of the United Kingdom or a Lieutenant Governor in India shall be eligible. We further propose that Her Majesty shall have the power to appoint to be a Peer of Parliament any person on account of any special qualification other than one of those mentioned, provided that not more than two persons shall be so appointed during any one calendar year; and that a person shall not be appointed under this section until Her Majesty the Queen has, by a message to the House of Lords, stated Her Majesty's intention to appoint such person and the special qualification on account of which he is proposed to be appointed. That restriction has been introduced for the purpose of avoiding the danger which I distantly glanced at. That will make a power of creating five in all. We then add—

"The number of Peers at any one time entitled in pursuance of this Act to vote shall not exceed 50, and it shall not be lawful to make any appointment in pursuance of this Act which will make such number for the time being exceed 50."

Of course, these numbers may be regarded as excessive; but I wish to point out that they are a maximum. I am not entering into any kind of engagement on the part of the present Government, still less on behalf of the Sovereign, that five Life Peers will be created every year. I have the greatest doubt whether the possibility of finding five proper persons for Life Peers every year will present itself with the facility that some people think. My noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Pembroke) said, in a recent debate, that he wanted us to create at once 200 Life

Peers; but the prospect filled one with alarm, and I do not think that the most inventive imagination will discover 200 fit candidates for an immediate Life Peerage. I consider five Life Peers a-year to be a maximum, and I do not believe that number will be filled up every year. Of course, it is a matter of speculation in what way they will be received. Some persons have suggested that they would feel themselves in a position of inferiority, which would hinder their usefulness in this House. I think we are dispensed from any apprehension of that kind by the position Life Peers have already obtained in this House. Their position is not only not one of inferiority, but in many cases it is so distinctly superior that I think we may set aside the fear that if the men are men of merit there is the slightest danger of anything of that kind. A totally opposite fear crossed my mind. Ultimately it may come to be thought that as Life Peers are created for merit that is recorded, and Hereditary Peers for merit that is not recorded, an Hereditary Peerage is a less desirable dignity of the two. But whatever may be the case, I am quite sure that when the Life Peers are properly selected they will not only find a hearty welcome, but a very attentive audience. I know that several noble Lords behind me will say in their hearts—"What necessity is there for any Life Peers at all?" I have never put forward Life Peerages as a great panacea; but I think they will be of use, and there are several reasons why. One which has been constantly suggested in previous debates was supported by a striking instance by the noble Earl who leads the other side. It is that it often happens that a man who would be very useful in this House and would contribute very much to its debates is unable to accept a Peerage because of the burden that a title would impose upon his descendants. Another reason why we should desire the presence of Life Peers is furnished by consideration for the work of the House itself. Some of your Lordships may ask—"Is not the work sufficiently well done at present?" I reply that that is a question that must admit of a double answer. In some respects, and on some subjects, the work of the House is admirably done. Nothing could be better attended to than legal matters in this House. Nothing could be better as regards knowledge of the subject than the treatment of land questions in this House. Nothing can be better attended to than Church questions are in this House; but when we get outside these three categories I do not think that we are sufficiently well manned. We have some distinguished soldiers and sailors, and some soldiers, as we know, are not allowed to speak so often as we could wish. Still, on these subjects, I doubt whether the representation is sufficient to make our debates adequate, or the examination of measures which come under our consideration sufficient. But outside of these things, when you come to questions of finance, mercantile matters, engineering matters, and a number of other departments of thought and activity, they are hardly represented in this House at all. If the House should pass this measure, it will make the House more efficient for its debates in these respects. And there is another advantage which I think will commend itself to the noble Earl the late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who first introduced this question in the present year. He indicated, in no obscure terms, that he thought the creation of Hereditary Peers had been too extensive in recent years, and he was rather inclined to suggest that it was the fault of those atrocious persons the Conservatives; but I think, if he will look back on the years that have passed since we last discussed this subject in 1867, he will find—it is my impression, at all events—that the large creation of Hereditary Peers has not originated with the Conservatives. But detaching ourselves from all questions of individual responsibility, and merely asking ourselves what is better for the House and the country, I entirely agree with the noble Earl that the rate has been rather high. One of the hopes I have of this measure is that it will diminish the creation of Hereditary Peers, and in that case it will give more freedom and more elasticity to the Crown in the distribution of honours, as well as more fitness to the House for discharging its important duties. There is another subject which I have to call attention to. It is one that does not admit of much discussion. The noble Earl kindly spared us the difficulty of lengthy definition by introducing a phrase which has been generally adopted, so that this has come to be known as the question of the black sheep. I doubt whether the evil is so great as it has been represented to be. I have not had the pleasure of meeting the black sheep supposed to be in every corner of the House; but, assuming that they are there, a step towards the removal of them will be taken by the passing of this Bill, for it will give the House a power which it does not now possess—that of expelling a Member. It can only have that power on the same conditions on which the House of Commons has it—that is to say, it must always remain with the constituent authority to restore a peccant Member of the House if it should seem good to it to do so. In our case, the constituent authority is the Crown, and, therefore, it must always remain in the power of the Crown to issue again a Writ of Summons, if it should be advised to do so, to the noble Lord who has been the subject of this operation. The Bill proposes that it shall be in the power of the Queen, on an Address presented by the House of Lords, praying that the Writ of Summons to every Peer named therein shall be cancelled, by Royal Sign Manual to direct that the said Writ shall be cancelled. Such cancelling will be good during the currency of that Writ—that is, during the existing Parliament—and unless Her Majesty shall issue a special Order to the contrary, that Writ shall remain permanently cancelled. Of course, both for the purpose of repairing errors and of dealing with offences which do not seem to call for so much severity, power must be reserved to the Queen, under Constitutional advice, to re-issue at a later period of the Session the Writ of Summons which has been cancelled. That is merely giving to this House a power which the other House possesses. If it should be the pleasure of Parliament to give that power to this House, it will then be our duty, in the framing of our Standing Orders, to determine how that power shall be exercised, under what conditions, subject to what checks, and under such restrictions as shall prevent the possibility of injustice. I have to apologize, perhaps, that there is nothing more startling in my measures. They are simply designed for the purpose of strengthening the House of Lords, and of giving it a power of removing that which is objectionable, and of adding to itself that which is powerful and strong, and of doing its duty better before the country. They are not designed for the purpose of introducing any new principle into the Constitution, or of heralding any revolutionary changes in a Body which has lasted so long and which has done so much service to the State.

Bill to provide for the appointment of Peers of Parliament for life—Presented (The Marquess of SALISBURY).

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: My Lords, I do not know that it is necessary, or, indeed, respectful, to the economical measure which has been presented to us by the noble Marquess opposite, that we should inaugurate any debate upon it without further consideration. It is a modest measure, and it has been introduced by the noble Marquess in a singularly modest speech. He told us that the plans which were proposed to your Lordships by the noble Earl opposite and myself were killed by their own ambition. That is not my view of the subject at all. I do not know what my noble Friend's view may be; but my belief is that they were killed by the direct intervention of the noble Marquess. I share entirely the views and the extreme vigour with which the noble Marquess put before us the regret which he would feel if he ever thought this House should become the subtle instrument of a Minister of the Crown; but I am bound to say that, viewing the relations of Parties in this House, it cannot but be felt that this House—I do not doubt by sincere conviction—is infinitely too much on the side of the Minister of the Crown, and even of the noble Marquess himself. I do not say whether that is a good thing or a bad thing. That is not the point I am discussing at this moment. But what I have pointed out before to your Lordships is this—that the real danger to the House of Lords does not consist in the absence of five Life Peers appointed annually, or in the presence, the supposed presence, of what are called black sheep, who do not so often attend the House, but whose character, to some extent, invalidates the decisions of the House of Lords—the real danger, to my mind, has always consisted in this—

that under certain conditions, which it is not very difficult to imagine, there might be an utter want of sympathy between the House of Lords and the House of Commons, and the vast majority of the House of Commons might be entirely opposed to the vast majority of the House of Lords. Now, my Lords, recent events appear to show that that danger is not so remote as might be supposed; but, in any case, whether it be remote or not, the provisions of a wise Minister, I should have thought, would have been to guard against that, and not to attempt to deal with the House of Lords at all, unless he has some large, far-seeing, and exhaustive measure in view which would meet this very grave difficulty. Now, my Lords, as regards this particular measure which the noble Marquess has proposed this evening, while I do not think it respectful to deal with it on the present occasion; at the same time I do not see any great difficulty in doing so. It is not of that character as to offer insuperable obstacles to its discussion. But when you come to think that after the various Motions which have met with more or less favour at your Lordships' hands, after the very wide discussion in the Press and on the platforms, and after that most significant sign of all, the revolt of the eldest sons, when you come to think that the noble Marquess has nothing to propose but that a Rear Admiral shall be made a Life Peer, or that a Major General shall be made a Life Peer, or that a Privy Councillor shall be made a Life Peer, or that an Ambassador shall be made a Life Peer, one begins to feel that the subject is almost hopeless, and that it is hardly worth while proceeding with a reform of that character. I confess if I took into view simply the Bill proposed by the noble Marquess—speaking as an individual, for I have no notion whatever of the feelings of my noble Friends behind me—I should not care to see the Bill carried into effect. But with regard to another point, I confess that I should be inclined to give it my humble vote. My view is this—supporting it as well as I can—that when you once open the sluice-gate of reform into this House you will not be able to stop at this limited measure. I myself am not a very great believer in the remedy as the noble Marquess proposes it; I think, as I have already indicated, that it may even tend to degrade the quality of the Hereditary Peers hereafter to be created; because I think that, when a man has been hereafter created a Hereditary Peer, the tendency of the cynical observer of the House of Lords—and I must say I rather put the noble Marquess himself in that category—would be to say that that Nobleman has been created a Peer because he did not come within the various categories of fitness for Life Peerages. And my fear is this, which I believe the noble Marquess also shares—that the Hereditary Peer may hereafter come to occupy a very subordinate position in relation to the distinguished men whom the noble Marquess proposes to introduce. I do not know whether 50 or 100, or even 200, distinguished men would come in under the clauses of this Bill; but, at the same time, I think that its operation will be, as I have already said, rather to degrade the hereditary character of this House than to improve it. Now, my Lords, there is another process. The first proposal in the Bill is to make an addition; but it also contemplates a process of subtraction. With regard to the process of addition, I think it will not be very operative; but as to the process of subtraction, I venture to affirm that it will be absolutely inoperative. Is it quite clear, to begin with, that this House has not the power of expelling any of its Members by Resolution? I do not care to discuss that point; but if it has not the power, is it the least likely that for petty offences which in many cases unfit a Peer, in the opinion of the public, for the exercise of his legislative functions, that you will be able to get a House together and get an authority to move a solemn Address to the Crown for the removal of a Peer? My Lords, I do not believe it for a moment. I believe your process of expurgation will be a dead letter. No one will dare to take upon himself the invidious functions of censor without authority or inducement. I am firmly convinced of this—that the only possible method by which you can exclude undeserving Peers from the House of Lords is the method proposed by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Dunraven) as well as by myself—a process of delegation. My Lords, under these circumstances, I do not think I have anything further to add to the remarks I have ventured to make on this Bill. I shall give it my humble support, not because of the intrinsic virtues of the measure, but because I believe it to be a certain precedent for larger, and more extensive, and more operative proposals.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that he had deliberately abstained from taking part in the discussion of this subject during the past two years, because he had had great doubts as to the practical character of the measures brought forward, and he had desired to defer any observations he might have to make on so important a matter until some definite proposal had been submitted to their Lordships. He was one of the last survivors of those who more than 30 years ago proposed to revive Life Peerages. His noble Friend who led the official Opposition in that House the other day was reported to have said that if the measure which they then proposed had been allowed to take effect the agitation for an alteration in the constitution of the House would probably have been delayed some time. Speaking for himself, he was not now of opinion that that would have been the result. Whatever movement there might have been for an alteration in the constitution of that House, it was much more deeply seated than would have been satisfied by such a change as was then proposed. He did not know whether his noble Friend would contradict him, but he submitted that the Government of Lord Palmerston 30 years ago had more in view the strengthening of the judicial element of that House than anything else. Looking back to that time, he felt bound to say that he thought the Government of Lord Palmerston rushed into that measure hastily and without due consideration. He did not think that there was one Member of that Government who believed that there was any doubt as to the legal and Constitutional power they had to create Life Peerages. Lord Campbell laid it down that they had the power. It was a curious fact, and it formed a piece of political gossip at the time, that if Lord Wensleydale had been well enough to take his seat on the first night of the Session no question would have been raised by the Law Peers. But as he was ill, he was compelled to delay taking his seat for three weeks or a month, and during that time the Law Peers got up the opposition. They did not fully consider—at least, speaking for himself, he did not fully consider—the influence which that measure would have on the independence of that House. His noble Friend (the Earl of Rosebery) had expressed doubt whether there would not be in the hands of the Ministry a much greater responsibility in that House if the creation of Life Peers were extended. For his own part, he could not help agreeing that the difficulty was very considerable. No doubt, there were other means at the disposal of a Minister; but, on the whole, he could not doubt that it would be more easy for an unscrupulous Minister to swamp that House if he had the unlimited power of creating Life Peers. If they were to continue to have two Houses of Parliament, he thought it should be agreed by all men that they ought to be independent of each other; that both Houses should have in their own sphere the character of independence of the Minister of the Crown, otherwise they could not perform their duty to the people. He agreed with the noble Marquess that there ought to be some limit on the creation of Life Peers; but this was not the proper time for discussing what should be the precise limit. He did not, however, understand the speech of the noble Earl who had spoken last, because the noble Earl said he would vote for that measure, but that he thought it would degrade that House. He could not quite understand those two propositions. The noble Earl said the Bill would open the door through which other measures would come in afterwards for further reforms of that House. He hoped that the noble Earl did not mean that those other measures were also to have the character of tending to degrade that House, and that he would also vote for them.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he did not want his words to be misapprehended. He had said that he thought the proposed introduction of Life Peers might rather have a tendency to degrade the Hereditary Members, and that in that respect he shared the surmises of the noble Marquess himself. His other argument was that that measure would open the sluice gate to other measures of reform.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: The noble Earl said that the measure would tend to degrade the Hereditary Peers, but nevertheless he would vote for it. For himself, he did not believe that the creation of Life Peers would have any such effect. They would be regarded as other Members of the House were; they would be respected for their individual character and ability, and many of them were men of great ability and took an active part in the Business of the House. They had heard some able speeches from the noble Earl about the reform of the House of Lords—a subject which he must say he had treated with great ability, but at the same time with an ability which was consistent with the avoidance of committing himself to any definite scheme. The noble Earl told them that there was a danger of that House coming into collision with the other House of Parliament. Of course there was. That was a necessary danger attending any Constitution under which they had two Houses of Parliament. But he asked what his noble Friend was driving at in his speeches in that House and out of the House? He must say that he thought persons in the position of his noble Friend who had been Ministers of the Crown, and who hoped again to be Ministers of the Crown, should not throw the great institutions of this country at the heads of the people without any indication of the direction in which they themselves would wish their reforms to go. It was pretty plain what his noble Friend meant. He meant that there should continue to be a Second Chamber, as it was commonly called, but one that should always agree with the House of Commons and which should say “Ditto” to the House of Commons—a House of Lords whose voice was never to be heard except in the symphony of “Amen.” If that was so, let him say it openly—let him tell them and tell the people that he wished to have a second House of Parliament that would never take an independent view of anything, and, therefore, would never be in danger of a possible collision with the House of Commons. They would then understand him. That reminded him of an incident which he witnessed a few years ago. Some American steamers, as their Lordships might know, were like Noah's Ark, and covered like a house with a roof, and no passenger was allowed to go on to the top of that roof without the special leave of the captain. It happened to himself to be on board one of those steamers, and the captain invited him to go up and see the views from the top of the ship. An American lady was there also at the time. An essential part of the machinery of such a steamer which wished to avoid danger was a steam whistle; and on the occasion to which he referred the whistle being set going the lady put up both her hands to her ears to shut out the dreadful noise. The captain afterwards said to her—“I am very sorry, madam, to have inconvenienced you, but you will be glad to hear that our great inventor, Mr. Edison, is about to take out a new patent for a steam whistle that is to make no noise at all.” “That would be delightful,” she thought. Well, his noble Friend was a sort of political Mr. Edison, who would undertake to produce a House of Lords, which would never dissent from the House of Commons, would never cry “No,” and would always say “Ditto” to that House. He could understand the doctrine that they should not have a House of Lords which would be in perpetual conflict and collision with the House of Commons. A greater calamity to the country could not well be conceived. He desired an Upper Chamber such as they had ever had for 600, 700, or 800 years, which should be gifted with insight into the great political instincts of the English people, which should be able to detect the movements of political opinion that were really such, and to distinguish those movements and the conclusions to which they pointed from the movements of impulsive passion which might at some unhappy moment threaten disaster to the State. That must involve the danger of occasional difference with the other House of Parliament. That was the use of the House of Lords—that was the use of the Second Chamber; and without that danger there could be no such use. His noble Friend, in a speech made in the North of Scotland the other day, said that the reform of the House of Lords was not pre-eminently, but only partially a Party question, and he agreed in that. But his noble Friend went on to say that the House of Lords was eminently obstructive of Liberal measures. He wanted to know what his noble Friend meant by "Liberal measures?" He supposed that he meant measures which emanated from the Party to which he belonged; and that the House of Lords ought never to dissent from measures proposed by the Party which he honoured with his Membership and adherence. Well, that was a very large order. But how far, he would ask, was it true that that House, in any large sense of the word, had been obstructive of the great changes which during the last half-century had been in the interests of the people? He himself had had the honour of being either a Member of that House or a close attendant on its debates as a boy on the steps of the Throne for very close on half-a-century—for 47 years; and he looked back to see what were the great movements of legislation in the interests of the people to which that House had been an obstruction. Besides many others of considerable importance, he found five or six changes which were considered almost revolutionary in their character. First of all, he found a series of measures, not promoted solely by the Liberal Party, but heralded and defended and promoted and patronized by one man who was throughout life more or less a Conservative—the late Lord Shaftesbury. Had the late Lord Shaftesbury any serious difficulty in carrying those measures through the House of Lords? No; the opposition offered to them in the House of Commons was much more serious than that offered in the House of Lords; and when they came to the House of Lords, although they were not received with enthusiasm—for that was not the special quality of their Lordships' House—they were passed with much less difficulty. He had no hesitation in saying that the Factory Acts were at that time considered to be measures of almost a revolutionary kind. They introduced an entirely new principle in our legislation—a principle full of doubt and difficulty even in the opinion of our most philanthropic and public men. Among the many measures which, during the last 50 years, had tended to prove the wisdom of Parliament and the political instincts of the British people, and which had tended to the happiness of the working classes, none, in his opinion, stood before the Factory Acts. He came now to the next question, the abolition of Protection. Protection of native industries was dear to the hearts and convictions of the leading men on both sides of the House, and in both Houses of Parliament. He remembered very well when Lord Melbourne sat in the place now occupied by the noble Marquess, and seeing by his side old Lord Holland, whose form and features recalled to their Lordships the well-known form and features of the illustrious man who was a near relative of his and one of the greatest of our English statesmen. At that time there was but one Member of their Lordships' House who was in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws. That was the late Lord Fitzwilliam. In a few short years the abolition of Protection was attained. The question was dealt with by the House of Commons under great difficulty, and under the pressure of circumstances connected with the potato famine in Ireland it was found impossible to resist the action of Sir Robert Peel. The question then came up to their Lordships' House against the individual convictions of the vast majority. There was no doubt about that; but their Lordships legislated on the question, and they submitted to the changes which they saw inevitable. The third question was the destruction of the Established Church in Ireland. If ever there was a measure which was odious to the feelings, the sentiments, and the convictions of a large part of their Lordships' House, it was the destruction of that Church. But their Lordships saw then, as the House of Commons had seen, that the time had come for the removal of that strange political anomaly. Instead of obstructing the measure, their Lordships' House made some alterations in it of a comparatively minor kind with regard to the interests of the clergy, and then allowed it to pass. He said, therefore, that in none of these cases was the assertion of the noble Earl true that the House of Lords had been an obstructive of Liberal measures. He came now to the question of the franchise. A large number of their Lordships were at that time in favour of the franchise, but he believed that if the Division had been taken as a mere question of philosophy, without reference to political circumstances, that extension would not have taken place. But that franchise measure was carried. He came now to the question of the redistribution of seats. Here they came to the last case on which there had been something like a serious danger of collision between the two Houses of Parliament. At that time he sat on the opposite Benches, but, though not in Office, he voted with Mr. Gladstone's Government against the postponement of the Franchise Bill for the purpose of seeing the Redistribution Bill. He voted against the postponement of that Bill because he had some personal confidence in the sense of responsibility under which his right hon. Friend Mr. Gladstone acted in regard to redistribution. He felt a tolerable confidence that Mr. Gladstone would not produce a Bill which at that time was called a "jerrymandering Bill." He must say, however, that he had no right to expect other men to have that personal respect and confidence which he felt in the right hon. Gentleman; and he was far from saying that the House of Lords was not right in asking that the two Bills should go forward together, or, at least, that the proposals of the one measure should be known before the other was passed. This question nearly led to a serious collision on account of the passionate manner in which Mr. Gladstone discussed it. He accused the House of Lords openly in many speeches of wishing to destroy the Franchise Bill through a demand for the Redistribution Bill. He believed that was an entirely erroneous view. He believed that the great majority of their Lordships were willing to vote for the Franchise Bill, and that its postponement until the Redistribution Bill was forthcoming was a really bond fide desire on their part to have the full scheme of reform before them. But how did that matter end? Of course, if their Lordships had to deal with passionate men, with Ministers who would not allow the great elements of the Constitution to have free play, with Ministers who were so passionate that they would not allow the Second Chamber to have a say in such matters as this, then there would always be friction. But the whole British Constitution turned on legal and Constitutional points. The danger of collision did not come from their Lordships, who, while acting unfortunately, as he thought, at the moment, acted strictly within their Constitutional rights, and in the exercise of which their vote ought to have been respected. But how did this matter end? That House was firm, and it ended in a compromise. The two Parties met, and a Redistribution Bill was agreed upon. Could his noble Friend say that this was a case in which their Lordships' House obstructed a Liberal measure? It was a case in which the two Houses of Parliament, acting under a due sense of public duty, and acting to some extent on different opinions, procured a compromise which he believed would be happy in its results. His noble Friend spoke as if every measure of the Liberal Party should be received by their Lordships. Did his noble Friend remember the warning lately given to them by his illustrious Chief about the present state of the Liberal Party? His noble Friend had forgotten that. In the General Election of 1885 Mr. Gladstone said he had the honour of being at the head of the Liberal Party; he had long known it intimately; he had long known its virtues—he forgot the terms of the eulogium, but he remembered that it was very fine—and he warned the people of Mid Lothian that the Liberal Party was not to be trusted if it had to depend on the votes of the Irish Members. But what did the right hon. Gentleman do now? His right hon. Friend had fulfilled his own prophecy. The noble Earl forgot that by the confession of his Leader the portion of the Liberal Party which was under the influence and domination of Mr. Parnell was not in a position safely to represent the interests of the country. He was a thoroughly convinced Gladstonian on that point. But if that be the position of the Liberal Party at present by the confession and prophecy of its illustrious Chief, was it reasonable that his noble Friend should insist upon such a reform of the House of Lords that it should always accept whatever that section of the Liberal Party agreed upon? That apparently was the meaning of his noble Friend's language. He had spoken thus that evening because, having a full and anxious desire to see any changes made in their Lordships' House which should be in the direction of development and strengthening it for the great purposes of the Constitution, he wished to know whether they did or did not recognize what those purposes were. He had read his noble Friend's speeches, and he had been amused and edified by their extremely dexterous character. But he repeated that the noble Earl had given no indication, even last week in the North of Scotland, of the purposes and direction in which he wished their Lordships to go. He had felt it to be a public duty to say so much on this the first opportunity he had had of addressing their Lordships on the subject. He would not now discuss the proposals of the noble Marquess, preferring to wait until they were before the House, when he hoped their Lordships would enter upon their discussion with the full desire to do what they could, even if it should be only, as his noble Friend said, a first step towards enlarging and strengthening the constitution of their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, he did not wish to say anything about the Bill at present, because he thought any observations could best be made on the second reading stage. He rose merely to express satisfaction that the Prime Minister had introduced a Bill of this character, though he confessed that his satisfaction was derived rather from a hope of favours to come than from a conviction that the Bill would solve the problem or satisfy the requirements of the case. He did not believe that the House could be reformed in the necessary direction by any creation of Life Peers. With regard to that part of the proposal of the noble Marquess which related to the exclusion from that House of the so-called "black sheep," he admitted that he did not exactly know to whom that expression referred; but, at all events, those who were indicated by it did not sit either upon the Front Bench beneath him or upon the Front Bench opposite, and, in fact, they were very few in number. He fully recognized, however, that the feeling created abroad by the presence of delinquents in that House could not be measured by the number of those delinquents, but must be gauged by the view that was taken of the matter by the country, and by the amount of prejudice which might be raised against the House by the fact of their presence in it. He, therefore, attached great importance to that provision in the Bill which gave powers to the Crown to cancel a Writ. Those powers ought to be exercised on the basis of attendance at the Sittings of the House, Rules being framed by their Lordships enforcing more regular attendance. He regretted that the noble Marquess, in introducing this measure, had given no indication that its provisions might be extended to the great Colonies and the Dependencies of the Crown.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY was understood to say that he had already stated that the provisions of the Bill would extend to any person who had been the Governor General, and to any Civil servant who had served in the Colonies and who had been made a Privy Councillor.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, he was glad to find that he had been in error upon this point. He did not think that any great advantage would be derived from conferring Life Peerages upon soldiers and sailors, seeing that both the Services were already well represented in that House. He had no desire upon that occasion to discuss the provisions or the merits of the Bill; but he might say that he did not agree with the noble Earl opposite in his estimate of the measure. He believed that the Bill, taken in conjunction with the results which might flow from the Commission which had been moved for the other day by the Lord Privy Seal, would prove a useful one. He did not suppose for a moment that it would meet all the requirements of the case, but he looked upon it with all the more favour because it appeared to carry out the view which the Prime Minister had emphasized so strongly the other day when he told their Lordships that he did not desire on the part of the Government to take up the non possumus position with regard to the reform of that House. He trusted that, a proposal for the reform of that House having been initiated by Her Majesty's Government, if this Bill should prove inadequate they would be willing to go a step further, and to supplement it by a fuller measure of reform.

LORD NORTON said, that with reference to a remark which had fallen from the noble Lord opposite, to the effect that this Bill would not prevent collisions occurring between the two Houses of Parliament, he wished to ask him whether he thought that any measure that could be passed would have the effect of preventing all possibility of collision between those Bodies? He did not suppose that the noble Earl opposite entertained such an idea, any more than that he entertained the idea attributed to him by the noble Duke opposite of rendering that House a silent partner of the House of Commons, which should exist merely for the purpose of endorsing and registering the decrees of the other House. He desired to call the attention of their Lordships to the wide divergence in point of principle between the Bills which had been respectively introduced by the noble Earl opposite and by the noble Earl who had last spoken and that under discussion of the noble Marquess. The proposals of the noble Earls involved the introduction of a new principle into the essential constitution of this House—namely, that its Members sat by virtue of Crown appointments, whether hereditary or for life; whereas, by the proposal of the noble Marquess, that principle would be retained intact. Nearly all those who had thought upon this subject were agreed that it was necessary that there should be a Second Legislative Chamber in all free Constitutions, and there was high authority in favour of that view, the framers of the Constitution of the United States having come, after the ablest and most exhaustive discussion, to the conclusion that to have only one Chamber would be fatal to freedom and to the continuity and stability of government. They recognized, as their greatest difficulty, the desirability of the Second Chamber being of entirely different constitution. Those who proposed to make the House of Lords partially elective failed to appreciate the great advantage that the two Houses should be differently constituted. It was the dissimilarity of constitution which had given the House of Lords its peculiar usefulness in relation to the Commons. By long and historical prestige it had been rendered what it was impossible for new Constitution makers to create. If once we destroyed the special constitution of the House its inimitable service in our Legislature could never be regained. He had heard it said that there was no historical record in existence of the peculiar original constitution of this House; but no very deep historical research was needed to establish the fact that the Barons, lay and spiritual—the one hereditary, the other for life—were an emanation from the Crown as the permanent branch of the Council of the Kingdom. They had found it desirable to separate themselves, in Edward the First's Reign, from the elective and continually changing portion of the Council, which consisted of delegates from shires and boroughs. It was a fallacy to suppose that popular election must, in accordance with some theoretic spirit of the age, be introduced into the constitution of every institution. Popular election, when in the hands of managers and Caucuses, ended less in popular representation than the constitution of this House. Election was not necessary to representation; and there might be too much of it for really popular interests. If such a principle were introduced into the composition of this House it would change it from being what it ought to be and was—a Supplemental Body, co-operating with the legislative action of the other House—into a mere rival of the other House and looking always to the same agencies outside. On these grounds, he maintained the Bill of the noble Marquess was the only safe proposal that had been submitted to the House.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, he was not at all alarmed by the suggestion which had been made that if this Bill passed it would not be final, but that something more might from time to time be done afterwards. When that something more was proposed the House would, of course, judge whether it would do good or evil. This was a subject as to which it was desirable to legislate from time to time upon matters which the House conceived to be practical, and which might be carried into effect consistently with the general principle of maintaining this House as an efficient Second Chamber. He was, therefore, not unwilling to contemplate the possibility of further measures. With regard to the Bill itself, he thought it was called for by the necessities of the country. He had been always one of those who thought that the House took a very strong measure when it laid down as a doctrine of Constitutional Law that the Crown, though it might create Life Peers, could not entitle them to seats in their Lordships' House, unless at the same time there should be some sort of remainder by way of inheritance. That decision had been acquiesced in so long by the Crown and the country, as to make it now, practically, part of the Law of Parliament; but he thought it rendered necessary some such measure as this in order to get rid of the general exclusion of Life Peers, and, so far, he welcomed the measure of the noble Marquess. With regard to the limitations proposed by the noble Marquess, he concurred more distinctly in the limitation as to time than in that as to the maximum number. He quite agreed that there should be such a reasonable limit put to the number of Life Peers to be created within a definite space of time as would prevent an abuse of the power for the purpose of overturning instead of strengthening the Constitution. He had, however, more doubt of the limitation of the number to 50. He could not help thinking that it would not be a permanent limitation; he doubted whether it was desirable that it should be. If, as was not now proposed, but as might at some time be rendered necessary by the multiplication of Hereditary Peerages, the number of Peers who were to sit in the House and exercise legislative functions were limited, it was doubtful whether there would be any need for a definite limitation of the total number of Life Peers. The noble Marquess proposed, in certain cases, to take power to recall, or not to issue, Writs to Peers who would otherwise have a right to sit in this House. That proposition appeared to him fairly to raise another question, on which his own opinion differed from that of many others. So far from considering that this House would lose strength, if those entitled to succeed to it were permitted to retain the status of Commoners until they applied for Writs, he thought the contrary. He thought it would be of considerable advantage if a person to whom the right to succeed to a Peerage had come were not compelled to resign a seat in the House of Commons until he applied for a Writ to issue summoning him to the House of Lords. He could not think that would in any degree tend to weaken the House of Lords; and if it were not done, persons, who, being in the line of succession to a Peerage had attained a position of eminence and usefulness in the other House of Parliament, might be dissatisfied with the hereditary part of the constitution of the House of Lords. His reasons for thinking that the House of Lords might gain more than it lost by such a change were, that, in the first place, it was most desirable that those who came to take a prominent part in the discussions of the House of Lords should have the opportunity of a good training in the House of Commons. They should accustom themselves to the prevalent tone and feeling of the constituencies and of the other House, and learn to understand and to be in sympathy with the views which prevailed there, and when they came to the House of Lords they should bring to it as much knowledge as possible of the other House and of its spirit and its way of doing Business. There had been cases where the necessity of a Member of the House of Commons leaving that House and entering the House of Lords on his succeeding to a Peerage had disturbed the whole political arrangements of the country. It was so when Lord Althorp became Lord Spencer, which caused almost a political revolution. Such cases might from time to time recur, and he thought it would be a great advantage if in these, and indeed in all cases, the successor to a Peerage might, at his option, remain a Commoner until he desired to take his seat in the House of Lords. It ought to be borne in mind that this was not a House in which young men, as a rule, took much part in the debates. Owing to what might be termed the absence of enthusiasm and the intermittent character of the debates, the younger Members of this House did not speak as often as the House of Commons would probably hear them if they sat in that House, and they had, therefore, not the same advantages in regard to preparation for the duties of a statesman as they would have if they remained longer in the House of Commons. Nor was it correct to say that if this choice were given, the most distinguished men to whom the right of Peerage came would always stay in the House of Commons. He believed that after they had acquired political influence and experience there, most of them would come to this House, when they could be of the greatest use to it. The late Lord Derby and Lord Russell came to this House of their own free will, and men who had made their mark in the House of Commons, but who were getting on in years, constantly, of their own free will, left the House of Commons to become Members of that House. The House of Lords was very much in the position of a Senate, and into the character of a Senate the idea of seniority usually entered.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not rise to prolong this discussion, as it was somewhat inconvenient to discuss a Bill on the Motion for its first reading, and before the House had had an opportunity of studying the details. The discussion, however, he admitted, had led to some pertinent remarks from his noble Friend on that Bench and some interesting suggestions from the noble and learned Earl. He should not, on the present occasion, enter into the merits of the Bill, nor did he feel inclined to follow the example of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), who imagined a speech as having been delivered by a noble Lord on that Bench, and then proceeded to demolish it. The speech which the noble Duke attributed to his noble Friend (the Earl of Rosebery) he had never heard delivered. The noble Duke attributed to the noble Earl a desire to make this Assembly subservient to the House of Commons. As far as he understood the arguments of his noble Friend the other day, it, on the contrary, appeared to be the object of his noble Friend to strengthen this House. The noble Earl very sensibly urged that every attempt should be made to bring the two Houses as much as possible into harmonious co-operation. He (Earl Granville) did not desire to go into the recent history of the House of Lords. It was not his business or wish to bring an indictment against it; but there were people who did wish to do so, and some remarks that had been made that evening would probably prompt those persons to show some recent instances in which certain measures certainly had been delayed by the House of Lords. Into this matter, however, he did not wish to enter; but he could not help referring to the attack made by the noble Duke against Mr. W. E. Gladstone, and the charge that Mr. W. E. Gladstone had some time ago stimulated the agitation against the House of Lords. No doubt, there was such an agitation of which a political Leader possessing Mr. W. E. Gladstone's power might have taken advantage and carried to a turning point; but their Lordships would, he felt sure, remember how Mr. W. E. Gladstone, on the contrary, abstained from fanning that agitation and was careful to do all in his power to calm it.

UNITED TELEPHONE COMPANY BILL
(by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) moved, "That the Bill be read a second time on Thursday week."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Second Reading be deferred till Thursday 28th June."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) said, he understood that the Bill had been put on the Paper that day for the purpose of being taken.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, the understanding was that the Bill was not to be taken before Thursday next; and he had not been able to consult his hon. Friend, who took a more active part in the matter, as to the exact day on which he would be able to be present. He had, therefore, moved that the second reading be postponed until Thursday week.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) said, he must be allowed to express a hope that the date of the second reading would now be definitely fixed, as hon. Members had been brought down to the House on several occasions in regard to the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE WATER BILL.

MOTION FOR AN INSTRUCTION TO THE COMMITTEE.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.), in moving—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the South Staffordshire Water Bill to insert the auction clauses with reference to the £60,750 unissued balance of the ordinary stock, and to the £41,637 unissued balance of the loan capital of the South Staffordshire Waterworks Company," and who was almost entirely inaudible, was understood to say that he was quite willing to make it optional on the part of the Committee to follow the Instruction, provided that, in the event of their not doing so, they had to give their reasons and the facts upon which these were grounded. He ventured to remind the House that if the Company had not obtained many years ago the power to raise money which they did not want, and had never used this unissued—and which then would have been new—capital would, as a matter of course, have been subject to the Auction Clauses, and he asked the House to say now that it should be treated as new capital. The present case was almost strictly analogous to that of the Limsfield and Oxted Waterworks Company, where, when Parliament authorized the raising of new Stock, the unissued original Stock was made subject to the same restrictions as the new Stock. The question was, whether the ratepayers of the district were to pay interest upon an extra sum of £30,000 that would simply go into the pockets of the shareholders of the Company, and, in the event of the waterworks being taken over, were to be saddled with an additional sum of £30,000 for the Company's works? Practically, the Stock was now a certain 5 per cent Stock, and for the last 10 years the Company had paid a dividend of 4 per cent, and the shares had been steadily going up in value, and might be expected, at no very distant date, to reach the maximum dividend of 10 per cent. It would be said that the present high price of the Stock, which was quite recently sold at 138 ex. div., was due to the purchasers having counted upon getting allotments of the unissued Stock at par; but this could not seriously be contended, as little more than 15 per cent of the Stock had yet to be issued, and the increased value of the shares was really due to the fact that in the last 20 years the dividends had steadily increased from 1 to 5 per cent.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the South Staffordshire Water Bill to insert the auction clauses with reference to the £60,750 unissued balance of the ordinary stock, and to the £41,637 unissued balance of the loan capital of the South Staffordshire Waterworks Company."—(Mr. Kelly.)

MR. WIGGIN (Staffordshire, Handsworth), in opposing the Motion, said, the antecedents of the South Staffordshire Water Company were very different from what they had been represented to the House. He, therefore, wished to explain the exact position of affairs at the present moment. The great mining district of South Staffordshire was for many years, in consequence of the prevalence of coal, ironstone pits and other mining works all over the district, very badly supplied with water. The supply was altogether insufficient, and of a very poor description. A number of gentlemen interested in the district met together, and formed a small Waterworks Company, with the object of supplying water to the South Staffordshire district. They had to search pretty nearly all over South Staffordshire before they could obtain a good supply. Experts were employed, and, by their advice, an investigation was made in the neighbourhood of Lichfield, where an excellent supply was found in the new red sandstone. Engines of something like 400 or 500 horse-power were erected, by means of which water was pumped to a great elevation, and the supply was spread over a distance of something like 40 miles, from Derbyshire on the one side to Worcestershire on the other, and the area supplied by the Company was 20 miles in width. The water supplied was excellent, and was a great boon to South Staffordshire. The scheme, however, was of no advantage whatever to the shareholders for the first six years, as no dividend was paid the first six years. In the next two years a dividend of 1 per cent was paid, and from that period the dividend had gone on increasing, until last year it reached 5 per cent. The demand for the water was very great, and 10 or 12 years ago the Company had to apply to Parliament for powers to increase the supply. They obtained powers to sink an additional well at Channock Chase, a very expensive operation; and they were altogether authorized to raise new capital of £350,000, of which about £300,000 had been expended on new works, and about £60,000 remained to be allotted, the dividend being limited to a maximum of 7 per cent, of which, however, there was little probability of its ever being reached. The complaint was that the powers Parliament had granted had never been used, and that the capital had not been raised or expended on new works. It was quite true that the 100 shares were now worth about £135, and it was for that reason that the purchasers of the original shares hoped to obtain the allotment of the unused capital, which was not new capital in any sense whatever. If it were a new capital, he quite agreed with the hon.

and learned Member for North Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) that it ought to be subject to the Auction Clauses. It was not, however, new capital, but capital issued and allotted some 10 years ago. It was capital in that position which the hon. and learned Member asked the House to put up for sale, and submit to the Auction Clauses, by which means the shareholders would be prejudicially affected. He trusted that the House would not sanction any such proposal. The Company were not asking for an extension of capital, nor were they proposing to erect any new works. They simply asked to consolidate certain Bills into one Act, as such a course would be more convenient and economical both to the Company and the district. He trusted that he had made himself properly understood. It was perfectly certain that the Company would be treated unfairly if any such repudiation as the hon. and learned Member referred to was agreed to.

MR. HINGLEY (Worcestershire, N.) said, he was not in any way mixed up with this Water Company, except as a consumer; but, as Mayor of Dudley, he was in a position to say that the water supply provided by the Company had conferred a considerable boon upon that borough. He thought it was scarcely fair, considering what the Company had done for the district, and the manner in which they had been called upon by the Sanitary Authority year after year to expend money, amounting in the aggregate to sums of from £10,000 to £30,000, to impose the restriction upon them which the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Kelly) had moved. For many years the Company had had a long succession of struggles, and the issue of the capital was required for the extension of works.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, the hon. and learned Member for North Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) had stated his willingness to express the Resolution in a different form from that in which it now appeared on the Paper; but he had not moved it in an altered form, and it was now submitted to the House as an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill. It was quite unnecessary to give the Committee any such Instruction as the hon. and learned Member had moved. In the case of the Limpfield and Oxted Bill a Committee certainly did inquire into the matter, and had provided that unissued capital should be subjected to the Auction Clauses. But this case differed altogether from the Limpsfield and Oxted case, and he confessed that he did not see any reason for adopting the Instruction which had been moved. The Limpsfield and Oxted Bill extended the area of the operations of the Company, and applied for the extension of the authorized capital which had not been issued or required in connection with the original scheme. It was right, therefore, in that case to treat it as new capital, and it came before the Committee in the same form as if it were fresh capital about to be newly authorized. The present Bill dealt with a balance of unissued capital which was now required in order to complete the scheme which was originally authorized by Parliament. It was unexpended capital to be spent on work already sanctioned and not yet completed, and he thought that it would be taking a strong step to subject capital of that kind to the Auction Clauses. There was no question whatever of the issue of new capital. He would suggest to the hon. and learned Member for North Camberwell that, as he had shown by the example of Limpsfield and Oxted, the question could be inquired into without an Instruction to the Committee, he should withdraw the Motion, and leave the matter in the hands of the Committee.

MR. KELLY said, after what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman he would withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Q U E S T I O N S .

LAW AND POLICE (SCOTLAND) — ARREST OF NEIL O'HARE—MIS- TAKEN IDENTITY.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire) (for Dr. R. MACDONALD) (Ross and Cromarty) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is true that a person named Neil O'Hare, agent for a firm of Glasgow hide merchants, and well known for many years in the Western Highlands and Islands, was lately apprehended by the police in the parish of Lochalsh, and conveyed to a cell in the prison of Portree, and there detained from Saturday 2nd to Monday

4th June current, notwithstanding substantial bail being offered for his appearance by friends to whom he was well known; whether O'Hare repeatedly protested his innocence of any crime, and asserted that the police were mistaken in apprehending and detaining him if they were really in search of some accused person; whether on the Monday night O'Hare was discharged, without apology or explanation, other than he had been taken for a person of the same name accused of committing some offence in another county; and, whether, seeing O'Hare was a well-known and law-abiding person for whom bail was tendered, he, the Lord Advocate, will take such steps as may be necessary to prevent such conduct on the part of the police in the future, and cause Neil O'Hare to be properly compensated?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): It is the fact that a person of the name given was apprehended by the Skye police, at the instance of the Argyllshire authorities, at Tobermory. He unfortunately bore the same name, and was engaged in the same class of work in the same part of the country, as a man against whom a charge of serious crime was laid in Argyllshire. He was brought to Portree, and a full description of him was at once telegraphed to Tobermory, the Police Inspector making arrangements to keep the wire open after hours that night, so that the authorities at Tobermory might communicate without delay. Instructions came that night to send him in custody to Tobermory on the following Monday. It appeared from a letter found on the man that his wife lived in Ireland, and the Inspector telegraphed this fact to Tobermory. The Procurator Fiscal at Tobermory telegraphed on Monday morning to say that the wife of the man wanted had been ascertained not to live in Ireland, but at Oban, that he thought there must be a mistake, and that O'Hare should be liberated. He mentioned in the telegram a point of personal description which might be a good test; and the Inspector, on examination, found that the man in custody did not answer to it. On this being communicated the man was at once liberated. O'Hare, and a man believed to be his brother, did ask whether he could be admitted to bail; but was correctly informed by the Inspector that he had no power to do so. The question of bail could not, by law, be considered until he had been brought before a magistrate having jurisdiction in the place of the alleged crime. The Inspector, on liberating O'Hare, expressed to him his sincere regret that in doing his duty he had been compelled to detain him, and at the annoyance to which O'Hare had been subjected by the mistake of identity. I do not consider that the Inspector was to blame in the circumstances. He appears to have taken every step possible to prevent any delay in clearing up the matter, and to have O'Hare released if he were not the right man. It is not in my power to order any compensation to be made to O'Hare; but I think it right publicly in this House to express the regret of the authorities at an occurrence which is one of those that, unfortunately, must take place occasionally, even in the most careful conduct of duties of criminal prosecutions.

NORTH AMERICAN FISHERIES—SEAL FISHING IN BEHRING SEA.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the United States Government have officially announced the departure of the war ship Dolphin, and three other armed vessels, to the Behring Sea, with instructions to seize British or other vessels engaged in seal fishing in those waters; if Her Majesty's Government have sent a war ship to warn masters of British sealing vessels of the consequences of infringing the Alaskan Laws; and, if any of the vessels seized for alleged illegal fishing in 1886 and 1887 have been, as promised, released?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): In so far as Her Majesty's Government are aware, no such announcement has been made by the United States Government, nor has any British ship of war been ordered to Behring Sea. Orders have been given by the United States Government that the three British vessels seized in 1886, with their tackle, apparel, and furniture, should be restored to their owners. The vessels in question were the Onward, Caroline, and Thornton. As regards the seizures in 1887, we have not heard that any of them have been released; but proceedings in connection with all the seizures are before the American Law Courts.

CRIMINAL LAW (SCOTLAND)—SUSPICIOUS DEATH OF D. BALLINGALL, CO. FIFE.

MR. ASQUITH (Fife, E.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the death under suspicious circumstances, on April 8, of a gamekeeper called David Ballingall, near King's Kettle, in the County of Fife; whether it is the fact that two men, named Andrew Walton and David Wright, were arrested on suspicion, and have since been set at liberty; whether he can state why these men were not put on their trial; and, whether any further steps have been, or are being, taken to investigate the circumstances of Ballingall's death?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): My attention has been called to this matter. The facts are as stated by the hon. Member. After full inquiry, no evidence was obtained connecting either of the persons arrested with the event. Instructions were given that if any further evidence could be obtained, to report again and at once to the Crown Counsel.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE, WOOLWICH—ENTRANCE EXAMINATIONS.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.) asked the Secretary of State for War, What progress has been made in the arrangements for so altering the Regulations for the Entrance Examinations to Woolwich that the subject of natural science shall be duly represented?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I am sorry to be obliged to ask the hon. Member to postpone his Question for a week. We are still in communication with the Civil Service Commissioners on the subject; but I have every hope of arriving at new Regulations which will satisfy the hon. Member's claims on behalf of science.

PATENTS—SPECIFICATIONS OF COLONIAL PATENTS.

SIR BERNHARD SAMUELSON (Oxfordshire, Banbury) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that, whilst the specifications of American and other foreign patents are supplied regularly, and at an early date, to the Patent Office Library, and whilst our Patent Office supplies copies of patents taken out in this country punctually to our Colonies, information as to Colonial patents is received in this country at long intervals only, and in an incomplete form; whether he is aware that the absence of correct information as to Colonial patents tends to occasion great inconvenience, and not unfrequently considerable loss on our manufactures; and, whether he will endeavour, through the medium of the Colonial Office, to induce our Colonies to reciprocate the advantage which they derive from the early and regular information given to them of our patents, by furnishing to us similar information in return with regard to theirs?

THE PRESIDENT (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, he was informed that there was some delay in forwarding specifications of Colonial patents to the Colonial Office, and that inconvenience was occasioned at the Patent Office Library thereby. The Secretary of State for the Colonies was in communication with the Colonial Governments on the question, with a view to an improvement in this respect.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES)—WITHHOLDING GRANTS FROM VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS.

SIR CHARLES PALMER (Durham, Jarrow) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether any instructions have been given to Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools to withhold grants from voluntary schools unless the managers made certain extensions of the school buildings, although these buildings satisfied the requirements of Her Majesty's Inspectors in 1885 and 1886, and there has been no increase in the average attendance since that time?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): No, Sir; no such instructions as are indicated in the Question have been issued. If the hon. Baronet will give me particulars of any special case I will make inquiries, it being important to secure uniformity in dealing with these questions.

ADEN.

MR. ERNEST BECKETT (York, N.R., Whitby) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has discovered who was responsible for sending guns to Aden without sights; whether he intends to call the delinquent to account for his negligence; and, what he proposes to do to prevent, as far as he can, a recurrence of such negligence in the future?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): These were guns of a new description, and some delay arose in making sights owing to a question of pattern. As the latter are small articles, readily fixed and always packed separately from the guns, the officer whose duty it was to despatch the stores considered that it was best to forward the guns, which would take some time to mount, without waiting till the sights were ready. And as he had every reason to feel confident that, as the guns would take some time to mount, the sights could be sent out in ample time, I do not feel called upon to visit his conduct with censure. But this omission was not reported to the Director of Artillery at the time, as it should have been; and I have taken due notice of the omission. Steps have been taken to secure that, in future, all essential fittings for guns shall be ready for despatch as soon as the guns themselves.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—DISMISSAL OF JOHN DALY, SLIGO PRISON.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Prison Warder John Daly, of Sligo Prison, has been dismissed, after sworn inquiry, for having allowed prohibited articles into the possession of a prisoner; when was the inquiry held; when was its result communicated to Daly; and, whether he has any objection to furnishing a copy of the information sworn at the inquiry to Daly?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The man referred to was dismissed for the reason stated. Subsequently, on his own request, a sworn inquiry was held on the 26th of April. The result, which confirmed the decision already arrived at by the General Prisons Board, was communicated to him on the 9th of June. The Board report that the course suggested would be contrary to practice.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if Daly was examined at the inquiry; and, also, if the Government made any inquiry of the prisoner in question—my hon. Friend the Member for South Galway (Mr. Sheehy)?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware if that is so.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—THE LOUGH-REA DISTRICT.

Mr. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What action has been taken with regard to the appointment of Registrar for the Loughrea District; also with regard to the appointment of sub-sanitary officer of Loughrea Union; and, why the application of the Guardians of Loughrea Union for a powder licence for Mr. Peter Sweeney, their building contractor, has been delayed, which delay has prevented Mr. Sweeney from carrying out important public contracts?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The person who acted ad interim Registrar has been appointed to the vacancy. The Guardians have appointed a sanitary sub-officer, and have submitted the appointment for the sanction of the Local Government Board, before whom the matter now is. As regards the last paragraph, the Guardians have been already informed that a licence for dynamite and blasting powder cannot be issued to the man referred to, as he is not considered a fit person to hold such a licence.

Mr. SHEEHY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman how long the Local Government Board have had under their consideration the question of sanctioning the appointment of the sanitary officer?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer that.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE MILITIA — FINES FOR DRUNKEN-NESS.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY (Hereford) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the amount that has accrued from fines for drunkenness in the Militia since 1878 will be distributed among the battalions of that Force, in accordance with the precedent of 1879; and, if so, whether deprivations of Militia bounty for offences will be similarly dealt with?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY,
WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK) (Surrey, Guildford) (who replied) said: There is no accumulation from these fines, as the amount is spent from year to year in aid of increased pay to the Militia sergeants and corporals. The hon. Member will find that the sum is taken as an appropriation in aid of Vote 5 of the Army Estimates.

INDIA—THE UNCOVENANTED CIVIL SERVICE—FURLONGHS.

Mr. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that members of the Uncovenanted Civil Service of India who were in receipt of a salary of Rs. 6,000 a-year on February 10, 1876, and those appointed by the Secretary of State for India, obtain two years' furlough on half-pay after eight years' service, whereas members of the Uncovenanted Civil Service who have been appointed by the Governor General of India can only obtain one year's furlough after 10 years' service; and, on what principle is this distinction drawn between members of the Uncovenanted Service appointed by the Secretary of State and those appointed by the Indian Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF
STATE (Sir JOHN GORAT) (Chatham): (1.) Yes; subject to the qualification that those to whom the first part of the Question relates held certain specified offices at the date mentioned; and that those mentioned in the last part of the Question have been appointed by the Governor General in Council without the sanction of the Secretary of State, given either before or after the appointment. (2.) On the principle that the Uncovenanted Service should be recruited, as far as possible, from Natives of India; and that appointments carrying the special privilege mentioned should be filled by officers who are selected in England with special qualifications, or who have gained their appointments by competitive examination involving expensive training.

INDIA—THE UNCOVENANTED CIVIL SERVICE—PENSION RULES.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether members of the Uncovenanted Civil Service of India who are nominated by the Secretary of State for India as officers of the Public Works, Telegraph, and Forest Departments are allowed to count service for retirement on pension from the year they leave Cooper's Hill or other College, irrespective of age, whereas service before the age of 22 years, in the case of an Uncovenanted civilian appointed by the Governor General of India, is not permitted to count as service for retirement on pension; whether officers in the Administrative Departments of the Uncovenanted Civil Service of India have been placed, before the age of 22, in charge of Divisions of Districts, and in exercise of the powers of magistrates of the first class; did the Government of India in 1868 recommend that the limit of age for service counting for pension should be reduced; and did the then Secretary of State for India refuse to entertain it; and, on what principle is this distinction drawn between different members of the Uncovenanted Civil Service of India?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The answer to Questions 1, 2, and 3 is affirmative. The principle of the distinction is that more favourable Pension Rules are given to Departments recruited in this country, for which special training is requisite.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—THE AMANDEBELE COUNTRY.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies,

Sir John Gorst

Whether he can now state the boundaries or extent of the "Amandabele country with its dependencies" (mentioned in the Treaty of Friendship of 11th February of this year), of which the permanent Chief, Lobengula, undertakes not to alienate any portion without the previous sanction of Her Majesty's High Commissioner for South Africa; and, whether he can state whether that territory is bounded on the north by the Zambesi River?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government are not at present in a position to state precisely the boundaries and extent of the territory over which Lobengula claims to have authority. It is, however, understood that this territory is bounded, in part at all events, to the northward by the Zambesi.

SCOTLAND—ISLAND OF LEWIS—PAYMENT OF RATES.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Lord Advocate, If he can state the amount of poor and education rates due by owners and occupiers respectively in the Island of Lewis for the present year which is still unpaid; whether it has been customary in that Island for the owner to collect rates with the rents in the case of holdings under £4 annual rental; whether it is true that, in consequence of the refusal of the principal owner in the Island to pay tenants' rates in the customary manner, thousands of crofters are in danger of being struck off the roll of Parliamentary voters; and, how many collectors there are in the Island to whom small tenants can pay their rates direct, so as to enable them to retain their status as voters?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): It has been impossible, since this Question was put upon the Paper, to obtain all the particulars required by the hon. Member; but I may state that recently £3,574 of rates have been paid up by proprietors and tenants. The principal proprietor's factor has declined to pay the rates for those tenants under £4 who have not paid any rents, but has paid the rates of all who have paid rent. There are four collectors of rate—namely, in Stornoway, Barvas, Lochs, and Uig.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 — THOMAS BARRY, CONVICTED OF CONSPIRACY.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the case of Thomas Barry, convicted on May 31st, at Castle Martyr, of conspiracy, and sentenced by Resident Magistrates Gardiner and Redmond to a month's imprisonment, any evidence was taken beyond the fact of his personal refusal to supply goods to a member of the Constabulary?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It would seem that much additional evidence was taken. It was proved that a Boycotting conspiracy existed among several shopkeepers not to deal with the police, involving, as such conspiracies always do, mutual compulsion and coercion.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My Question was rather more specific than that. I knew that several persons were tried at the same time; but my Question is, whether, in the case of the man I have mentioned, Thomas Barry, evidence was taken beyond the fact of his personal refusal to supply goods that he was implicated in the conspiracy?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; evidence of conspiracy was given.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: In this case I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consent to lay the evidence on the Table.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That would be a very unusual course. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no!] The hon. Gentleman who said "No, no" cannot have had much Parliamentary experience; but it is a very unusual course to lay the evidence in such a case on the Table, and I could not give an answer in the affirmative without consideration.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): May I ask a Question with reference to this? I have read an account of the evidence in this case; and I cannot find there is any such evidence as that stated by the right hon. Gentleman in the printed account. I wish to know, will the right hon. Gentleman furnish from some other source the evidence to which he refers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; for the right hon. Gentleman's satisfaction, I believe I can supplement the printed account.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether or not it was sworn at the trial that Barry was a member of the conspiracy?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, Sir; I have stated what I believe to be the fact, that evidence as to Barry's participation in this conspiracy was given at the trial. I do not know that I can give a more specific reply either to the hon. Gentleman, or to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite.

BOARD OF TRADE (WORKING OF RAILWAYS).

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is now in a position to introduce a short Bill to deal with the several points of safety arrangements on railways, and Returns of Overtime Work, on which he undertook, on the 8th of May last, to legislate?

THE PRESIDENT (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, he had no hope, during the present Session, of introducing such a Bill. As to the Returns of Overtime, he intended to insert in the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill a clause requiring statistics, which he thought would cover that point.

POST OFFICE—CONVEYANCE OF MAILS —NORTH OF SCOTLAND.

MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.) asked the Postmaster General, What arrangements had been made for the conveyance of mails by the down London day mail combined with the Scotch night mail from Perth to Inverness and the North of Scotland after the 30th of June.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University), in reply, said, he had assented to a proposal made by the Railway Company that the train conveying the London day mail and the Scotch night mail from Perth to Inverness should remain under the control of the Post Office. No alteration would, therefore, be made after the 30th.

ENGLISH UNIVERSITY COLLEGES.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can yet state the intentions of Government as to affording any assistance to the English University Colleges?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): This Question would have been more properly addressed to my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council. I may say, however, that I believe that the Lord President and the Vice President received a deputation on this subject, and have since been in communication with the various Colleges, in order to ascertain all the material facts of their position. The information asked for is not yet, in all cases, complete.

THE METROPOLITAN ASYLUMS BOARD

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Metropolitan Asylums Board has accepted a tender for the erection of a small-pox hospital at Darenth which is £5,000 in excess of the lowest of the nine tenders received?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The tenders for the erection of the hospital for convalescing small-pox patients at Darenth ranged from £41,928 to £59,100. The lowest tender was by a firm at Sleaford; and before the tender was accepted the managers received a communication from the firm requesting that they might be allowed to withdraw their tender, as the cost of the cartage and other matters very much exceeded what they had anticipated. The next lowest tender, which was for £47,000, was accepted.

CHELSEA HOSPITAL—GEORGE WILLIAMS—ARREARS OF GOOD CONDUCT PAY.

MR. ARTHURO'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Upon what grounds the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital refuse to pay to George Williams the amount of arrears of good conduct pay to which he is entitled, and which was certified to be due to him, and payment of which was promised by the Letter of the Commissioners, No. I. Bd. 1. 6. 85, Case No. 31, dated 8th June, 1887?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK) (Surrey, Guildford) (who replied) said: Under the Warrant of 1848, 1*d.* a-day was added for each good conduct badge to pensions—whether temporary or permanent—granted on their discharge to soldiers incapacitated in the Service—the temporary pension being renewable for such period as the circumstances might warrant. It was decided by Viscount Cardwell, in 1870, that a temporary pensioner, whose pension was so renewed, had no claim to have good conduct pay added to the renewed pension. Pensioner Williams claims arrears of this good conduct pay, which was not added to his renewed pension in 1865. The present Secretary of State is of opinion that a soldier who was granted a temporary pension under such circumstances, and whose temporary pension was so renewed or made permanent, should have the good conduct pay added to pensions, as had been the case up to the decision of Viscount Cardwell in 1870. He caused his interpretation of the Warrant to be notified to the Chelsea Commissioners, who informed Williams that he would get the arrears. It was subsequently pointed out that the Secretary of State would require the approval of the Treasury to a reversal of the decision of a former Secretary of State, involving the grant of arrears. The Treasury differed from the Secretary of State in his interpretation of the Warrant, and held that, as the Chelsea Commissioners and Secretary of State for the time being refused to recognize the claim, their Lordships could not grant the arrears asked for.

ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH—POST OF CHAPLAIN.

LORD HENRY BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true, as stated in the Press, that it is the intention to disestablish the post of chaplain at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich; and, if so, on what grounds?

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) also asked, If the recent Regulation, dispensing with a chaplain at the Woolwich Academy, is a permanent or only a temporary one?

Sir John Lubbock

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): No definite decision has been arrived at. I am sorry to say that there is no chapel in the Royal Military Academy, and, therefore, there is some doubt as to the necessity for a resident chaplain, unless the duty can be taken, as it formerly was, by one of the Professors; but there is no intention of leaving the cadets without proper spiritual supervision.

POST OFFICE—LETTERS FROM THE SQUADRON IN CHILIAN WATERS.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is the case that the Chilian Government have recently refused to allow letters to be sent to the British Squadron serving in Chilian waters in any other way than through the post office; and, if so, whether he will be able to arrange any plan by which the seamen and marines can continue to send and receive their letters for 1*d.*, in accordance with the privilege that has been granted to them for many years in all parts of the world?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I am not aware that the Chilian Government has recently refused to allow letters to be sent to the British Squadron in Chilian waters in any other way than through the Post Office. That Government has certainly within the last few months raised objections to the delivery of bags containing homeward letters direct from Her Majesty's ships in Chilian waters to mail packets proceeding to England; but I have been in communication with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the subject, and I have no reason to suppose that the diplomatic steps taken in the matter will fail to secure the maintenance of the privilege.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — INDEBTEDNESS TO CONTRACTORS FOR FOOD.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that in five Unions of Ireland a considerable debt has been incurred to contractors for food supplied for purposes of relief under the belief that it would be met by the provisions of the Relief Act passed by the present Government; and, if the Government will find money to settle such of these debts as are owed for goods bonâ fide supplied, or if they will introduce a measure which will enable these five Unions to borrow money to pay the contractors; and, if not, will they suggest any course by which these contractors can recover the money of which they are actually out of pocket?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It is the case that the Guardians of five of the Unions scheduled under the Poor Relief Act, 1886, incurred large debts to contractors who supplied food for the purposes of exceptional out-door relief. The Guardians had no grounds for believing that this debt would be met by Government; and they were warned by the Local Government Board of the consequence of extravagant expenditure. As regards the concluding portion of the Question, I beg to refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave a few days ago in regard to the Swinford Union.

COLONEL NOLAN: What was that?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I certainly do not propose to pay the debts of these Unions.

COLONEL NOLAN: But will you allow legislation by a private Member for the purpose?

[No reply.]

BRITISH GUIANA — MEDICAL INSPECTOR OF ESTATES HOSPITAL.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is the case that the Court of Policy of the Colony of British Guiana have passed a Resolution requesting the Secretary of State for the Colonies to remove the Medical Inspector of Estates Hospitals from his office; whether this action of the Court of Policy is traceable to a Report made by that officer in the course of his duties which was considered to have "injuriously reflected on the planters;" and, whether it is the intention of the Colonial Secretary to comply with this demand without investigating the correctness, or otherwise, of the allegations contained in the Report?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Combined Court have passed a Resolution of the nature suggested in the first paragraph of the hon. Member's Question. The action of the Court is understood to be the result of dissatisfaction on the part of the members with the manner in which the officer has discharged the duties of his office; and particularly with certain statements in an Official Report made by him, which they consider to have reflected unjustly on the employers of immigrant labour. The Secretary of State has received such conflicting statements supporting and contradicting the allegations in the Report that he would be unable to arrive at a conclusion as to their correctness without a Commission of Inquiry; and he has not considered the question to be of sufficient importance to justify the expense of such a Commission. He had already decided, before receiving this Resolution of the Court, to transfer the officer in question to another appointment in the Colonial Service.

PASSENGER ACTS — THE TRANS-ATLANTIC STEAMERS FROM LIVERPOOL.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether Transatlantic steamers sailing from the ports of Liverpool and Queenstown ever put to sea with an over complement of passengers; and, whether the ship's surgeon is, or has been, instructed in such cases by the authorities from Liverpool offices, or their agents at Queenstown, after leaving port to make over the hospital for such passengers' accommodation?

THE PRESIDENT (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.): The emigration officer is the last person to leave the ship before she sails, and it is his duty to see that there is for every passenger the space and accommodation required by Statute. I have every reason to believe that the duty is strictly performed.

DR. TANNER: May I ask, whether the Board of Trade inspecting emigration officers always visit the hospital before they leave the ship?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I presume they make such inspection as they consider necessary?

DR. TANNER: I beg to give Notice that on going into Committee of Supply I shall raise this question.

Baron Henry de Worms

ADMIRALTY—H.M.S. "BELLEISLE."

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Where H.M.S. Belleisle is at present; how long she has been absent from her moorings at Kingstown; and, when she is to return there?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The Belleisle is at present at Devonport, undergoing her annual re-fit. She has been absent from her moorings since January last on special duty, and will return there as soon as the summer manœuvres are over—in about six weeks.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—SECRET INQUIRY AT FALCARRAGH, COUNTY DONEGAL.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following in The Daily News:—

"At Falcarragh yesterday four prisoners were remanded for the fourth time to Derry Gaol for seven days for refusing to give evidence. An old man named Shane O'Donnell fainted on his third journey from gaol. He was with great difficulty resuscitated, and was eventually discharged;"

how long has O'Donnell been in prison altogether; and, has he been charged with, or convicted of, any crime?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The District Inspector of Constabulary reports that The Daily News' allegation that O'Donnell fainted is untrue. On the contrary, he was perfectly well during the entire journey. O'Donnell can hardly be described as an old man. His age is 64. He was first committed to prison on the 24th of May, and brought up on two subsequent occasions on remand, and finally discharged on the 13th of June. There were no previous convictions against him.

MR. W. REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the alleged offence on which he was discharged?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he would require Notice of that Question.

MR. W. REDMOND: May I point out that the right hon. Gentleman has failed to answer that portion of the Question in which I inquired how long O'Donnell was in prison, and if he was convicted of any crime, or charged with any crime, and that the right hon. Gentleman said there was no previous conviction.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly he was committed for an offence—of refusing to answer a question that he could have answered. With regard to the other Question of the hon. Member, I stated that he was committed on the 24th of May, and finally discharged on the 13th of June.

MR. W. REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, upon what ground he makes the allegation that the man was committed to prison for not answering a question which he could have answered? How does the right hon. Gentleman know that the man could have answered the question or not? What evidence was there to show that he could have answered it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the Resident Magistrate so held from the facts of the case.

EGYPT—MISSION OF MUKHTAR PASHA.

MR. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can give any information as to the probable duration of Mukhtar Pasha's Mission in Egypt?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I can only reply to my hon. Friend, as I have done on previous occasions, that Her Majesty's Government are unable to give any information on the subject of the probable duration of Mukhtar Pasha's Mission.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (METROPOLIS) — COLLECTIONS OF MONEY — THE PARKS AND OPEN SPACES.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will bring in a Bill to repeal the by-law of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which gives power to prohibit public meetings amongst the poorer classes of the Metropolis by taking from them the power of collecting money to pay their printing and other expenses?

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) also asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman will make inquiry into the grounds alleged by the one ratepayer on which the Metropolitan Board of Works made the additional by-law forbidding collections on open spaces approved by him on the 24th of February last; whether he will inquire if similar collections have taken place without objection in the Metropolis on behalf of Sunday bands for more than 33 years, and on behalf of various political and charitable objects for more than 40 years, and whether any breach of the peace or other public evil or annoyance has arisen in consequence of such collections; and, whether, pending such inquiry, he will direct the police not to initiate further prosecutions for alleged breach of such additional by-law?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have been in further communication with the Board of Works, who inform me that the by-law complained of does not apply to collections of money on behalf of bands and musical performances which have been expressly allowed by the Board. These collections are made in the form of selling programmes and letting of chairs, and are not of the same character as collections made after public meetings, when persons frequenting the Parks, whether they join the assemblages or not, are solicited for money. I have asked the police to report to me whether the practice, in their opinion, tends to a breach of the peace, or creates any public evil or annoyance. I have also written to the Board of Works asking them to consider whether, inasmuch as no by-law such as this is in force in the Royal Parks, and inasmuch as its enforcement has apparently occasioned more vexation and annoyance than it prevents, any sufficient reason exists for maintaining it. The power of varying and altering by-laws is vested in the Board of Works. The prosecutions are instituted by them, and not by the police. I hope legislation may not be necessary on this subject now that attention has been drawn to it.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that on the previous day several policemen in uniform, and some in plain clothes, were employed in taking down the names and addresses of persons collecting, and that special action was being taken by the Police Authorities in connection with those collections?

MR. MATTHEWS said, he was not aware that such proceedings had been in progress. The prosecutions were initiated by the Board upon information which the Board had themselves gained.

MR. BRADLAUGH further asked the right hon. Gentleman, did he know that the by-law, as it stood, gave Park-keepers under the Metropolitan Board of Works authority to enforce the by-law; and that the action taken by the police in uniform gave the impression that they were acting under the instructions of the Government?

MR. MATTHEWS said, he would take care that no such impression as that could be justified.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—COLLECTIONS OF MONEY.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether collections are allowed after meetings held in the Royal Parks in London; and, whether such collections have lately taken place?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): There is no rule against making collections after meetings in the Royal Parks. Such collections have recently been made.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACT — VACANCIES IN THE STAFF OF INSPECTORS.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that there are two vacancies in the staff of Factory and Workshop Inspectors; and, if so, whether one vacancy has been open for some months; and, whether, seeing the strong evidence before the Select Committee on the Sweating System of the necessity for increased inspection of factories and workshops, the Government will fill the vacancies without further delay?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): There is at present only one vacancy in the Factory Inspectors' Department, a vacancy which recently occurred having been filled up by an Inspector who was redundant on the staff. The other vacancy has been open for some months, for this reason. I nominated a gentleman who seemed to me to be well qualified, as he had practical experience in factory work. For reasons which I need not detail to the House, but which do not alter my opinion as to his fitness, he was unable to satisfy all the requirements of the new scheme of examination which was settled by my Predecessor. I hope, however, that in a short time he will be able to satisfy the Civil Service Commissioners, and the vacancy will be filled.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—THE RESIDENT MAGISTRATES.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What steps has the Lord Lieutenant taken to satisfy himself of the legal knowledge of the Resident Magistrates who try cases under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, especially cases of conspiracy?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The duty referred to is one vested solely in the Lord Lieutenant by Statute. He acts with a full sense of his responsibility in the matter; and I do not see that any public advantage would be served by entering into the explanation required in the Question, even if it were proper for me to do so.

LAW AND JUSTICE — "INFERIOR COURTS OF RECORD"—THE RETURNS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the note in italics at the head of the Return, "Inferior Courts of Record," showing that such Return is "preliminary." If he can state when the complete Return is likely to be laid before the House; and, in the event of it being impossible to furnish such Return by an early day, whether he can make any statement as to the probable number and nature of the Inferior Courts not included in the Preliminary Return?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: It is impossible to say when the complete Return will be ready. Urgent application for the requisite particulars has been made to 194 Courts, in addition to those to which the preliminary Return relates. Inasmuch as there are doubts whether many of these Courts are not obsolete, much difficulty is anticipated in obtaining the whole of the information sought for. As to their nature, 57 of them are Courts of Request; 56 "Hundred" Courts; 75 Borough Courts; one is a University Chancellor's Court; and five are miscellaneous.

THE WESTERN PACIFIC—EXPULSION OF THE REV. JOHN JONES FROM MARE.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will produce the précis of a conversation between the Acting Consul at Noumea and Mr. Lacascade, then Director of the Interior for New Caledonia, forwarded to the Foreign Office two years ago by Consul Layard; whether the Vice Consul, New Caledonia, now in London, has given any information respecting the expulsion by the French of the Rev. John Jones from Maré; and, whether a satisfactory settlement of the case of Mr. Jones has yet been obtained by Her Majesty's Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I can only state that communications are in progress on the subject of the hon. Member's Question, and that it is not desirable to present any Papers just now.

THE THAMES EMBANKMENT—SUBWAY FROM PALACE YARD.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) (for Mr. CONYBEARE) (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can now state what conclusion he has arrived at respecting the opening to the public use of the subway leading from the corner of Palace Yard to the Thames Embankment?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.) said: After consulting with the First Commissioner of Her Majesty's Office of Works, I have come to the conclusion that there will be no objection to the re-opening of the subway from Palace Yard to the Thames Embankment to the public use.

PRISONS (IRELAND) — PRISONERS AT LOUGHREA.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following protest of 11 prisoners in Loughrea as to their treatment:—

"Taken from our beds at 3 o'clock on Wednesday morning, kept in the police barracks and Court until 2 o'clock, when the inquiry commenced, forced to sit listening to depositions being read until 6 that evening, and then, having our application for bail refused, committed to Loughrea Bridewell (11 men in all), where there was only accommodation for three, and even these beds were almost wet and filthy;"

and, whether he will inquire into the truth of these allegations; and, if they are true, take steps to prevent similar treatment of unconvicted prisoners?

MR. HARRIS (Galway, E.) also had the following Question on the Paper:— To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the following statement alleged to have been made by 11 men charged under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act at Loughrea on Wednesday:—

"Taken from our beds at 3 o'clock on Wednesday morning, kept in the police barracks and Court until 2 o'clock, when the inquiry commenced, forced to sit listening to depositions being read until 6 that evening, and then, having our application for bail refused, committed to Loughrea Bridewell (11 men in all), where there was only accommodation for three, and even these beds were almost wet and filthy;"

and, whether this statement is well-founded; and, if so, whether he will take steps to save unconvicted prisoners from such treatment in gaol in future?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Perhaps I may be permitted now to reply also to the Question of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Harris). The charge was not under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act, but under the ordinary law. The District Inspector of Constabulary reports that, bail having been refused, it was necessary to lodge these prisoners in the Bridewell. Some were accommodated in three available cells, and the remainder in the day-room. The former had beds which were neither filthy nor wet; and the latter were given such spare rugs and blankets as were at the keeper's disposal. The question of the accommodation for, and treatment of, untried prisoners generally throughout the country has been engaging the attention of Her Majesty's Government.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): May I ask, if the Government will offer any explanation of the tactics which they are now resorting to in Ireland, and of taking men out of their beds at the dead of night? Could not they make the arrests either before bed-time or after the people had risen?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I suppose the usual course is for the police to arrest persons when they can find them. The people appear to have escaped arrest before.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): What is the charge against these men?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The charge is not under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, but under the ordinary law. I believe it is a prosecution for conspiracy.

INDIA—MR. J. T. FERNANDEZ, CIVIL ENGINEER.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to the Petition of Mr. James Thomas Fernandez, lately in the Indian Service as a civil engineer; whether the recital of facts in that Petition is generally accurate; and, whether it will be possible to re-consider the case of the Petitioner, with a view to affording him the restitution for which he asks?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): I am not sure to what Petition the hon. Member refers; but a Memorial from Mr. Fernandez was, in 1887, addressed to the Secretary of State in Council. The facts were not accurately represented in that Memorial. Mr. Fernandez resigned after 10 years' service in 1884, being at the time under suspension. In April, 1885, he was re-employed on a temporary engagement; but in November he was again suspended, and his services were dispensed with, he being granted a month's salary as an act of grace. The case has been fully considered by the Government of India and the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State sees no reason for re-considering the decision arrived at.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DISMISSAL OF MR. P. LOUGHRY—TULLA UNION.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Patrick Loughry, Poor Rate Collector, Tulla Union, has been dismissed by sealed order of the Local Government Board; whether any communication passed between the Local Government Board and the Board of Guardians before the issue of the sealed order; and, whether he will state what was the nature of the offence charged against Mr. Loughry for which he was dismissed?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I reply to the first paragraph in the affirmative; to the second in the negative. As regards the last portion of the Question, the Local Government Board considered the man an unfit person to hold office under the Irish Poor Relief Acts, he having been sentenced to imprisonment in default of finding sureties for his good behaviour.

MR. COX: What is the offence he was summoned for, and for which he refused to find bail—will the right hon. Gentleman state that?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that information.

MR. COX: I beg to give Notice that I shall put a further Question on the subject.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS) — HYDE PARK—BATHING IN THE SERPENTINE.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is aware that the south bank of the Serpentine is crowded with naked men and boys bathing at a time when Hyde Park is full of ladies; whether there is any regulation requiring the bathers to wear costumes; and, whether he will take steps to compel the observance of decency?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): Bathing is allowed in Hyde Park under the Regulations made in pursuance of the Park Regulations Act (1872), only from the south shore of the Serpentine, and only at the following hours:—In the morning from 5 to 8, and in the evening, at this time of the year, from 7.30 to 8.30. Bathers may not undress or land anywhere except within the space set apart for that purpose, and must observe the directions of the Park-keepers. I do not think that it would be possible to enforce any Regulations requiring bathers to wear costumes, considering the thousands who bathe there—amounting to more than 250,000 annually. Of course, if any specified charges of indecency are made they will be attended to; but I have not received any such complaints.

ABYSSINIA—RUMOURED RUSSIAN AGGRESSION.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the rumour, which appears in the papers, is true that a Russian officer has taken possession of the Port of Alifat, south of Tula, from which a road runs into Abyssinia?

THE UNDER SECRETARY of STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): We have no such information as is stated in my hon. Friend's Question.

ABYSSINIA (MR. PORTAL'S MISSION).

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers referring to the recent Mission to Abyssinia, which were ordered to be printed on May 8 last, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY of STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): It is hoped that these Papers will be ready in 10 days.

VENEZUELA—REDUCTION OF TRADE.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact that exports from Trinidad to the United States of Venezuela show a reduction of over 50 per cent during April last, as compared with the same month in 1885?

THE UNDER SECRETARY of STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth) (who replied) said: I am informed that the exports from Trinidad to Venezuela in April, 1885, amounted to £13,969; and in April, 1888, to £64,527. Deducting the exports of specie, the figures are £9,471 and £16,406 respectively; so that instead of a reduction of 50 per cent, as assumed in the hon. Member's Question, there has been an increase of nearly 500 per cent in the gross exports, and an increase of about 75 per cent in the exports excluding specie.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL — REPRESENTATION ON BOARD OF IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Local Government Bill will interfere with the right of appointing representation upon the Board of Improvement Commissioners now enjoyed by the University at Cambridge and by the Manchester Ship Canal Company at Runcorn?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): With regard to Cambridge, the Council of the borough are not at present the Urban Sanitary Authority; and it will be necessary that the case should be dealt with by a Provisional Order under Clause 55 of the Bill. It will depend upon the provisions of that Order, which will require the confirmation of Parliament, whether the University will be specially represented on the District Council. The Bill does not contemplate that in the case of Runcorn the Manchester Ship Canal Company should have the right of appointing members of the District Council.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICES — THE ENGLISH CONSUL AT AJACCIO, CORSICA.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the present English Consul at Ajaccio, Corsica, receives a yearly salary of £450, and £50 for office expenses; if it is true that his predecessor, Mr. Short, only received a salary of £120; when was the Deputy Vice Consulate at Bonefeccia done away with; what is the nature of the Consular business transacted in Corsica; what is the average annual amount received at Ajaccio in Consular fees; and, for what reason was the salary increased?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The salary and allowance of Her Majesty's Consul at Ajaccio are as stated in the first Question. Mr. Short, who was not the immediate predecessor of the present Consul, received a salary of £100, and office allowance of £50. The Deputy Vice Consulate at Bonifaccia was abolished on the 10th of May, 1886. The Consular business in Corsica is of the ordinary nature; there is nothing exceptional in it. The average for three years is about £7. The salary was increased on the death of Mr. Short's successor, by the advice of Lord Lyons, who strongly recommended the augmentation.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF MR. HOGAN, AT SORRHA PETTY SESSIONS, CO. TIPPERARY.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the report of a case recently tried at Sorrha Petty Sessions, County Tipperary, where Mr. Michael Hogan, Honorary Secretary to the local branch of the League, was charged with being "drunk and disorderly" on May 10, at the prosecution of Police Sergeant M'Clintock, of Pike Station; whether, according to the report, the case was dismissed by the magistrates on the evidence of the witnesses called for the prosecution, two of them being police constables; whether one witness, Constable Foy, denied having seen the defendant where he was charged with being drunk and disorderly, but stated—"That he saw him sitting on his own stilo, no way misconducting himself;"

whether another witness, Thomas Kennedy, called for the prosecution, admitted—

"Having been brought into the police barrack and asked to swear against the prisoner," while he deposed to not having seen him at all on the night in question; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will cause inquiry to be made into the conduct of Sergeant M'Clintock in this case?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Local Constabulary Authorities report that the case referred to was dismissed on the technical ground that it was not proved that Hogan was disorderly on the public road. There could be no question as to the fact that he was drunk and disorderly in his own yard. The allegations in the third paragraph are denied. Thomas Kennedy made the statement in Court referred to; but the police doubt its accuracy, for it was Kennedy's mother who had reported at the barrack that Hogan was drunk, and had assaulted Kennedy. The sergeant having asked Kennedy if he would prosecute for the assault, he refused. The sergeant then summoned him as a witness.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—PROCLAMATION OF THE CITY OF DUBLIN.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the Report presented to Mr. Justice Johnson on the 5th instant by the Constabulary Authorities regarding the state of the County of Dublin; whether that Report is of an exceptional character, or is substantially identical with all previous Reports regarding the County of Dublin presented to the Judges on similar occasions for the past 10 years; and, whether that Report is the sole ground on which such an outbreak of crime in Dublin County as would justify the enforcement there of the first section of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act is anticipated by the Government; and, if not, on what other ground is such an anticipation entertained?

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's) also asked, Whether, when the right hon. Gentleman decided to proclaim the City of Dublin under the section of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, he was aware of the condition of affairs reported to Mr. Justice Johnson, which that Judge described as satisfactory, adding that only 6 or 7 per cent of crime remained undetected; and, whether he will reconsider the question of applying the most stringent provision of the Act to that community?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I will answer both Questions at the same time. The answer I gave on Friday was that there was nothing—and there is nothing—exceptional in the state of crime either in the City or in the County of Dublin; and it is not in consequence of the exceptional state of crime that the Government have proclaimed the City and County of Dublin under Section 1. I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Murphy) that this provision is the most stringent provision of this Act; because the opinion has been expressed over and over again that it should be applied to the whole country as part of the ordinary law.

MR. CLANCY: May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he has not answered a single one of the three paragraphs in my Questions? He has left them completely unanswered.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought the information I gave the hon. Gentleman would have satisfied him; but as it does not, I may say that I will not lay on the Table a copy of the Report presented to Mr. Justice Johnson on the 5th instant. That Report was not of an exceptional character, and that Report is not the “Sole ground on which such an outbreak of crime in Dublin County as would justify the enforcement there of the first section of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act is anticipated by the Government.”

I have already stated, in answer to the Questions on Friday and to-day, that that is all the information I can give the House as to the grounds upon which the Government have acted.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): The right hon. Gentleman justified the application of Section 1 to the County Dublin not by the existing state of facts, but by some apprehension of what may happen. I wish to ask him whether the Report of the Constabulary Authorities to Mr. Justice Johnson affords any ground for anticipating an outbreak of crime; and, also, whether it is not the fact that the percentage of undetected crime in the City of Dublin is only 6 per cent, which is less than the average of any other town in the Kingdom; and, does that circumstance afford any ground for the apprehensions of the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman must have misunderstood the purport of my answer. I did not state that it was in consequence of an outbreak of crime which the Government anticipated that the Government had taken this step; and, as to the second Question, I would point out that it is not the amount of undetected crime that is the justification, or need be the justification, of using this section. The sole justification required by the Government is whether, in their opinion, the application of the section may not lead to the detection of crime which would otherwise remain undiscovered.

MORTMAIN—ISSUE OF LICENCES.

MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.) asked Mr. Attorney General, What is the number of the general, and what is the number of the special or conditional, licences in mortmain granted by the Crown since January 1, 1868; how many forfeitures have accrued to the Crown in the like period by reason of grants or conveyances in mortmain without licence; what steps have been taken to enforce observance of the conditions contained in the licences granted during the like period; and, during the like period, have any proceedings, and, if so, with what result, been taken on behalf of the Crown for breach of the conditions contained in any such licence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): The time which has elapsed since this Question appeared on the Paper has not been sufficient to obtain all the particulars for which the hon. and learned Member has asked. But I believe that since the date referred to 37 licences have been granted by the Crown; and, in addition, a considerable number of Charters, containing clauses giving such licences. I have not yet been able to ascertain whether any proceedings have been taken since that date. There have not, as far as I know, been any forfeitures.

THE QUEEN'S PRINTERS AND OTHERS —THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

MR. WARDLE (Derbyshire, S.) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he is aware that the issue of incorrect versions by the Queen's Printers and other privileged presses enjoying a monopoly of the right of printing the Book of Common Prayer was complained of in 1868 by the Committee of the Convocation of Canterbury, has led to the appointment of a Committee by the Convocation of York during the present year, and was alluded to in 1870 by the Royal Commission on Ritual in their Fourth Report; whether the terms of the Royal Letters Patent, granted to the privileged printers, provide for such irregularities being punished; and, if not, in what way can they be legally corrected; and, whether, in face of the fact that not one single correctly printed copy of the Statutory Prayer Book is now procurable (while the much bulkier "authorized" version of the Bible is printed with admirable fidelity), the Government are prepared to throw open the printing of the Prayer Book to public competition, or else to authorize Her Majesty's Attorney General to take proceedings to remedy the abuse alleged to exist?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I believe that it is a fact that in the versions of the Book of Common Prayer printed by the Queen's Printers and the other authorized presses certain minor variations from the Prayer Book annexed to the Act 13 & 14 Charles II., c. 4, exist. This fact was referred to, as the hon. Member states, in the Report of the Committee of the Convocation of Canterbury in 1868; but the variations in question were apparently not of sufficient importance to justify any action. On the contrary, I find in the Report the following words:—

"Most of the variations . . . are, in fact, improvements in regard to accuracy and to sense; nor could greater care and fidelity be reasonably expected than have grown up in the present century. In all ordinary particulars the Prayer Book as now printed is what the compilers would have wished to make it if their task had fallen to them in the present day."

It is a curious fact that the Prayer Book annexed to the Act, and the various sealed books which are deposited in accordance with the Act in Cathedrals, at the Courts at Westminster, and the Tower, differ in several matters of detail. I believe that the Letters Patent do not contain any special provisions with regard to such irregularities. In my opinion, although the matter is not strictly for me, it is not desirable that the printing of the Prayer Book should be thrown open for public competition; but I am able to inform the hon. Member that the Queen's Printers and the authorized presses last month determined to print an exact copy of the Prayer Book annexed to the Act, the publication of which will be duly announced.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—SMALL HOLDINGS BILL.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government are able to give any facilities for the completion of the discussion on the Small Holdings Bill, which was adjourned on Wednesday, May 10; and, if not, whether, in view of the general expression of opinion in favour of an increase in the number of cultivating owners of land, the Government will agree to the immediate appointment of a Select Committee to consider by what means, either in connection with Local Government or otherwise, this object can most effectually be accomplished; how far the practice of small ownership and cultivation has diminished in this country; and, whether there is any evidence to show whether such diminution is due to legislation?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In answer to the right hon. Gentleman, I have to say that Her Majesty's Government regret that, having regard to the present state of Business in this House, they are unable to afford facilities for the further discussion of the Small Holdings Bill; but they will willingly co-operate in the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the question of small holdings, and especially the points to which the right hon. Member calls attention.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CIVIL ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Treasury have taken any steps towards generally carrying into effect the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments as regards the placing of the establishments on a seven-hour scale of service; and, whether any Department has recently applied for a large increase of staff; and, if so, whether the Treasury will place the Lower Division clerks in that Department on the seven-hour scale, and thus carry out their intention, as expressed in Parliamentary Paper No. 227 (1884)—namely,

Mr. Wardle

"That this change it is the intention of my Lords to encourage wherever the increase of work justifies it," or an equivalent reduction can be made in the numbers employed?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The question as to the establishment of the seven hour scale of service in the Civil Establishments is one that has not been lost sight of by the Treasury, and considerable progress has been made in that direction, and will continue to be made when circumstances will permit. When any large increase of staff is applied for by a Department, the Treasury carefully bear in mind the seven-hour system of employment.

THE NAVAL AND MILITARY DEPARTMENTS — COMPOSITION OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD (Marylebone, E.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the dissatisfaction generally felt by the Services in the United Kingdom at the composition of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into their administration, he will recommend the addition of one Admiral and one General to the Commission?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It has not before been brought to the notice of the Government that the Services have expressed dissatisfaction with the names of Lieutenant General Brackenbury, Rear Admiral Sir F. W. Richards, Captain W. H. Hall, R.N., and Major G. S. Clarke, R.E., who are respectively Members and Secretaries of the Royal Commission. But the Government will consider the expediency of adding the names of another General and Admiral, and will communicate the fact to the House.

THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES—CHINESE IMMIGRANTS.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government would consider the advisability of carrying out as fully as possible the wishes of the Australian people in connection with the Chinese question; and, also, whether Her Majesty's Government would consider seriously the desirability of adopting the suggestion unanimously agreed to by the Conference of the Australian Colonies, to the effect that it would be advisable for the Imperial Government to enter into diplomatic negotiations with the Chinese Government, in order that a Treaty might be concluded between this country and China for a satisfactory settlement of the difficult question of the wholesale emigration of Chinese to the Australian Colonies?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The suggestions and recommendations made by the Australasian Conference with regard to the Chinese labour question are receiving the fullest and most careful attention of the Government.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—ARREST OF JOHN MARA.

In reply to Mr. CAINE (Barrow-in-Furness),

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.) said, that John Mara, who was charged before Mr. Newton at Marlborough Street Police Court with attempted pocket picking, was remanded twice, not three times. The evidence to which reference was made was forthcoming on Saturday last. The magistrate informed him that the prisoner was remanded, in the first instance, in order to ascertain if anything was known of him by the warders and detectives who visited the prison for the purpose—a course which was not unusual; in the second instance, because the magistrate at the close of that day's examination was informed for the first time that the evidence of two other detectives could be obtained whose examination was desired by the prisoner's solicitor. He was also informed by the magistrate that Story did not state that he was present in the Court on Monday, the 11th. He had been present, but had gone away, not knowing he would be wanted. Gregory did say that he was on special duty on the 4th; but he had not had time to ascertain what that special duty was. Detective Mott did not require 14 days to produce two witnesses. Inquiry was now being made into the treatment of Mara in Holloway. The Prison Rules declared that criminal prisoners before trial might, if they desired it, wear the prison dress; and they should be required to do so if their own clothes were insufficient or unfit for use, or had to be preserved for the purposes of justice. But the dress was of a different kind from the dress of a convicted prisoner. It was not usual for prisoners under remand to sleep on plank beds without a mattress. He was informed by the magistrate that the extent of the charge was, for the first time, made known to him at the close of the prosecution on Saturday, and, therefore, bail was taken. Up till then he did not know whether the case might not turn out to be a felony.

MR. CAINE gave Notice that he would take the earliest possible opportunity of moving a Resolution respecting the conduct of business at Marlborough Street Police Court.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked, Whether the Votes would be taken in their order on Thursday?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): My right hon. Friend has already stated that Vote 12 will be taken.

EAST INDIA (MR. WILLIAM TAYLER, OF PATNA).

Address for—

"Copies of a Minute by His Excellency the Governor General of India, dated the 5th day of February 1859;"

"Of a Letter from the Governor of India to the Governor of Bengal, dated the 4th day of March 1859;"

"Of a Letter from the Governor of Bengal to Mr. William Tayler, dated the 12th day of March 1859;"

"And, of a Letter from the Governor of Bengal to the Governor of India, dated 6th April 1859, with enclosure."—(Sir John Gorst.)

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been drawn to three letters in The Times and one in The Morning Post of that day absolutely denying that Mr. William Tayler, ex-Commissioner of Patna, had been offered an inquiry into his conduct in 1859, and had declined that offer; and whether, as that statement materially affected the Division on that question prejudicially to Mr. Tayler's interests, he was prepared to lay on the Table of the House copies of the whole Correspondence pro and con on which he based that statement, including Mr. Samuells' letter containing offensive imputations against Mr. Tayler, which he subsequently entirely withdrew, and which withdrawal caused Mr. Tayler to say that he did not think it necessary to pursue the matter further; also, whether he would lay on the Table copies of Mr. Tayler's two letters of September, 1856, in which he not only invited, but urgently requested, a judicial investigation into his conduct?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham), in reply, said, that the statement he made on Friday was that Mr. Tayler was offered an inquiry into the correctness of Lord Canning's belief that in the course of Mr. Tayler's proceedings at Patnamen were condemned and executed upon insufficient evidence. The Papers which the House had just ordered to be laid on the Table would amply justify that statement. The Papers which the hon. and gallant Baronet required were already before Parliament, with the exception of the letters of September, 1856, for which search would be made in the India Office.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE BANN, BARROW, AND SHANNON DRAINAGE BILLS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked, in reference to the introduction of the Irish Drainage Bills, for some time on the Paper, Whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was aware that at this moment one of the largest floods known for the last 20 years was covering the land near the river between Monasterevan and Athy; and, whether he was aware that all the small landholders would lose the whole of the potato crops, and that the other crops would be so injured by the water that they could not be used; and, whether he would take steps to bring in these Bills at an early date?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have already often expressed to the House my great desire to bring in these Bills at the earliest possible opportunity; but

I may remind the hon. Gentleman that no expedition on our part would have saved the tenants who are now suffering from the action of floods. If they were saved it would have had to be done by action taken three or four years ago.

MOTION.

—o—

DEATH OF THE GERMAN EMPEROR

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Sir, I rise to propose a Motion in accordance with the duty and privilege of this House at all times to express its own sympathy and the sympathy of the people of the United Kingdom in all the joys and sorrows of the Sovereign who, as Queen of this Empire, reigns not alone over vast territories, but I am able to say with confidence in the hearts and affections of Her people. The occasion on which the House is invited now to express its sorrow and concern is one of peculiar and certainly of most tragic interest. It was scarcely a year ago that the Crown Prince of Germany received the cordial and hearty welcome of this country, as a son-in-law of the Queen, and the Heir to the Throne of a great and friendly Empire, when he came here to take part in the rejoicings of the people on the completion of 50 years of the reign of a just, a wise, and Constitutional Sovereign. It was then known to many that he was suffering from a painful and distressing malady, which occasioned the greatest concern to all who were acquainted with or suspected its character. But His Imperial Highness, notwithstanding his illness, took part in public ceremonies, and especially on the occasion of the great Procession and Thanksgiving Service on the 21st of June, in which this House joined, exhibiting the deepest interest and taking a prominent and active part in the manifestations of joy and thankfulness in which the nation indulged. Physical weakness and suffering were never permitted by him to interfere with the discharge of his public or private duties. Gradually the disease gained upon him, but it never deprived him of his resolve to go through his daily task, and to devote the powers that remained to him and his unimpaired intellect to the service of his country; and I venture to say that no more pathetic and touching spectacle of courage and fortitude has been witnessed by the world than that which he exhibited. As a Commander in the field he had displayed courage and capacity; he could face death with his men in battle, and he knew how to care for the wounded and the sick after the struggle, and to see that order was restored among the civil population. But these qualities are common as compared with the fortitude that enables a man, on whom a fatal disease has fastened, making slow but sure progress from day to day, cheerfully and uncomplainingly to endure long and grievous suffering, and to go about his daily work sustained in the discharge of his duty by the sense of devotion to his country. A few weeks ago Europe lamented the death of the great Ruler whose reign had been prolonged beyond the ordinary life of man, and whose people had become great and prosperous and united under his rule. Now we mourn the death of his son, who possessed qualities which we believe would, in no less a degree, have tended to secure the good government and prosperity of Germany and the peace of the world. It is fitting, Sir, that we should carry to the foot of the Throne the expression of a nation's sorrow at the loss which the Sovereign has sustained in her domestic relations at the premature death of one who, in every position which he filled, obtained admiration and affection; and we may venture to hope that the sympathy which we now offer to Her Majesty may be some consolation to those on whom bereavement has fallen so heavily. I have now to move an Address of Condolence to the Empress Victoria, and I shall do so in very few words, lest by any expression of mine I should jar on the sanctity of the grief of the widow. Thirty years ago, amid general rejoicing, the Princess Royal of England was married to Prince Frederick William of Prussia. It was a marriage which we knew at the time was founded upon affection, confidence, and esteem, and on a thorough knowledge of the character of her husband. It was not brought about by political considerations — although the people of this country rejoiced at a union between the reigning families of two great Kingdoms which had much in common, and whose interests ought not at any time to be divergent—but we were assured that it proceeded from the purest impulse of natural affection, and the Princess Royal of England has had the happiness in her married life which was permitted to our widowed Queen in hers. The virtues and the results have been the same, and the people of England have watched with affection and pride the happy domestic life and the recent discharge of public duties, which have been imperious and exacting in their character, in the intervals permitted to the wife and the sick nurse. Sir, we desire to convey the expression of our deepest sympathy to the Empress in her sorrow—a sympathy which is extended to the people who are bereaved of a Sovereign whom they loved and trusted. I venture, Sir, to move the Address, which is—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to express the deep concern and sorrow of this House at the great loss which Her Majesty has sustained by the death of His Imperial Majesty Frederick William, German Emperor, King of Prussia, and to condole with Her Majesty on this melancholy occasion, and to pray Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to express to His Majesty, the present Emperor, the profound sympathy of this House with the Imperial and Royal Family, and with the Government and People of Germany. To assure Her Majesty that this House will ever feel the warmest interest in whatever concerns Her Majesty's domestic relations, and to declare the ardent wishes of this House for the happiness of Her Majesty and of Her Family. That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by such Members of this House as are of Her Majesty's Privy Council. That this House doth condole with Her Imperial Majesty Victoria, German Empress, Queen of Prussia, Princess Royal of Great Britain and Ireland, on the great loss which she has sustained by the death of His Imperial Majesty. That a Message of Condolence be sent to Her Imperial Majesty, and that Mr. Speaker do communicate the said Message to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, with a request that he will attend the Empress Victoria for the purpose of conveying it to Her Imperial Majesty.”

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Sir, I rise for the purpose of seconding the Address which has been moved by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury in terms so just and appropriate. With regard to the Joint Address to which we are asked to give our assent, I observe it is proposed we should express to Her Majesty and to the German Empress our share in the sorrow at the loss they have sustained, and that we should likewise convey to the German Empress the expression of our sympathy with her in the trial, which is probably the greatest which can in any instance happen to a human being, and which in her case has been enhanced, and, I may say, illustrated, by a devotion, a courage, and a patience during the trial, fluctuations, suspense, and pain of 12 months—a devotion second only to that of her illustrious husband. I am sure that every man among us feels that on this occasion we are discharging very much more than a formal duty; and, in truth, if we did not entertain that sentiment, we should differ from the whole of Europe and the entire civilized world. With regard to the event which has just taken place, and the survivors of that event, in the whole course of the experience with which we have been made familiar from day to day, we have followed them with a pitying as well as an admiring sorrow. I greatly doubt whether there ever has been a case in which one so exalted in rank and station as was the Crown Prince of Germany, and subsequently the German Emperor, has had such claims—I will not say merely upon the admiration, but upon the sympathy and pity of the world. Sir, it is touching to reflect on the enhancements of that great trial—the circumstances under which it occurred, the peculiar slowness and subtlety of the disease, the extreme and extraordinary strength of constitution of the sufferer, and the great advance in the resources of medical science which enabled its most skilful Professors to procure for the illustrious Prince a considerable but ineffectual and unavailing prolongation of life—and that prolongation we fondly hoped might be the precursor of recovery, but was in truth an addition to his suffering. Our recollections of the Emperor Frederick reach back for a long period of years, for it was in the first period of his happy marriage that he made a deep impression upon the minds of the people of England, and they felt that their interest in him was a personal interest, not only because of his association with our beloved Sovereign, but also on account of the qualities which he displayed in early life—the high intelligence, the wonderful simplicity and gentleness of character, the kindness which laid him open to the access of all men; and those qualities as time went on were destined to be followed up by fresh displays of the highest qualities I have stated. When he came back to this country after the War of 1870, it was impossible not to be profoundly struck with the fact that, after he had shown that in skill and valour he was worthy to take his place among the heroes of the world, he still displayed in a peculiar degree all the modesty of his youth. It seemed as if all were conscious of these facts but himself. His character remained precisely the same in its unassuming gentleness, and in its total absence of pretension, as it had been before he had had an opportunity of manifesting to the world the claims he had so well entitled to make upon its admiration. Sir, there may be a disposition to regret that the Reign of the Emperor Frederick was too short for the display of the qualities of the Ruler; but there is another view which, I think, will change that regret into thankfulness. The circumstances attending his ascent to the Throne made him still more conspicuous to the eyes of the world, and, I have no doubt, caused a yet deeper impression of the invaluable qualities of his mind and character to be made both upon the German people and upon mankind at large. It may well be said of him that in the course of a short time on the Throne he fulfilled a long time, for there was not an expectation, however fond, that had been entertained before he became Emperor which was not fully realized by all who heard of his daily share in the labours of the State, and the wise and comprehensive manifestation of his views on the condition of Europe, which were at the very earliest date made known to the German nation and to the nations around him. Sir, we have to hope that so far as human sorrow can be alleviated either by the expression of sympathy, or by glorious recollections, or yet by more glorious hopes—all that consolation will be enjoyed by those who are now mourning over the death of the German Emperor. But one wish, I think, remains to us, and it is this—that the recollection of his great qualities, of his singular union of wisdom with virtue and valour, that his known attachment to the liberties of his country and his respect for its Constitution, which made him so secure a guardian of the privileges of the people no less than of the honour of the Throne, and that all the winning personal qualities which in him showed forth that most beautiful and appropriate of all associations, the extreme of gentleness with the highest manhood; and, again, that the holy fortitude to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred which he had displayed upon the bed of suffering, a fortitude greater in degree than that of many a soldier, and, perhaps, of many a martyr—these recollections constitute a great and noble inheritance to the German people; and we trust that that great nation, through long periods of strength, prosperity, and virtue, will cherish the recollection that the Emperor whom they have lost was among the most precious possessions that can accrue to the lot of any people upon earth.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale): I do not rise, Sir, for the purpose of adding anything to what has been said. I only rise to say that, notwithstanding any political differences which may unhappily exist among Gentlemen who sit upon this side of the House, I can assure the House, and I can assure my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian that I—and I think I may speak for every one of those with whom I am in the habit of acting—entirely and fully concur in every word which has fallen from my right hon. Friend; and, further, that we thank him for the eloquent expression he has given of the thoughts and sentiments which prevail in every part of this House on this sad occasion.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to express the deep concern and sorrow of this House at the great loss which Her Majesty has sustained by the death of His Imperial Majesty Frederick William, German Emperor King of Prussia, and to condole with Her Majesty on this melancholy occasion, and to pray Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to express to His Majesty, the present Emperor, the profound sympathy of this House with the Imperial and Royal Family, and with the Government, and people of Germany.

To assure Her Majesty that this House will ever feel the warmest interest in whatever concerns Her Majesty's domestic relations, and to declare the ardent wishes of this House for the happiness of Her Majesty and of Her Family.

Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by such Members of this House as are of Her Majesty's Privy Council.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That this House doth condole with Her Imperial Majesty Victoria, German Empress, Queen of Prussia, Princess Royal of Great Britain and Ireland, on the great loss which she has sustained by the death of His Imperial Majesty.

Ordered, That a Message of Condolence be sent to Her Imperial Majesty, and that Mr. Speaker do communicate the said Message to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, with a request that he will attend the Empress Victoria for the purpose of conveying it to Her Imperial Majesty.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.—[BILL 182.]

COMMITTEE. [SEVENTH NIGHT.]

[Progress 15th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

COUNTY COUNCILS.

Powers of County Council.

Clause 3 (Transfer to county council of administrative business of quarter sessions).

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 18, to leave out from the word "subject" to the end of paragraph (iv.)—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Question, "That the words 'subject as to the use of buildings by the quarter sessions and the justices' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

MR. DUGDALE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton), in moving an Amendment, in line 19, after "justices," insert—

"To the right of the quarter sessions, and of any committee appointed by the quarter sessions, to use and occupy the shire halls, county halls, assize courts, and judges' lodgings as heretofore," said, he wished to explain that his object was to make it clear on the face of the Bill that any committee appointed by the Quarter Sessions should have the same right to use the Shire Halls, Assize Courts, and Judges' lodgings, as existed at the present time. Hon. Members were aware that committees appointed by the Quarter Sessions very often sat when the Court of Quarter Sessions was not sitting, and they were allowed the use of the Judges' lodgings whenever they required the accommodation. He asked his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) to accept the Amendment, for the purpose of making it clear that that right was not interfered with.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 19, after the word "justices," to insert the words "to the right of the quarter sessions, and of any committee appointed by the quarter sessions, to use and occupy the shire halls, county halls, assize courts, and judges' lodgings as heretofore."—(Mr. Dugdale.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, he must ask his hon. and learned Friend not to press the Amendment, because he thought it would be found, on looking at Sub-section (iv.), that everything desired by the Amendment was already secured. The sub-section transferred to the Council of each county—

"Shire halls, county halls, assize courts, judges' lodgings, lock-up houses, court houses, justices' rooms, police stations, and county buildings, works, and property, subject as to the use of buildings by the quarter sessions and the justices to the provisions of this Act respecting the joint committee of quarter sessions and the county councils."

In the event of any dispute arising upon this particular question, reference was to be made to the Home Secretary.

MR. DUGDALE said, he was satisfied with the explanation of his right hon. Friend, and would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DUGDALE, in moving, in page 3, line 25, to leave out Sub-section (vi.) which transferred to the County Council—

"The hearing of appeals relating to the licensing of gang-masters and to the granting of certificates to pawnbrokers," said, that the hearing of appeals was a judicial matter, and ought not to be dealt with by the County Council.

Amendment proposed, to leave out paragraph (vi.)—(Mr. Dugdale.)

MR. RITCHIE said, he was, upon the whole, inclined to agree with the argument of his hon. and learned Friend that the hearing of appeals was rather more in the nature of judicial than of administrative work, and that the powers at present exercised by the magistrates was that of hearing the evidence on oath. Under those circumstances, believing his hon. and learned Friend's contention to be right, and that it was really a judicial matter, he would accept the Amendment.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he did not think it at all satisfactory that this sub-section of the clause should be left out in this summary manner, nor did he think that the fact that the hearing of appeals might in some degree partake of a judicial character constituted any sufficient reason for relieving the County Council of this right. He was prepared to support any hon. Member on that side of the House in resisting the Amendment.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) said, that appeals arose, to a large extent, out of questions of fact, and he did not think that they should lessen the power of a County Council. He, therefore, regretted very much that the Government had shown a disposition to give way on a matter of that kind.

MR. RITCHIE said, no doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Firth) was correct in stating that there were many questions of fact connected with the granting of licences; but he would also be aware that one of the reasons of withholding a licence was the personal character of the individual who applied for it, and that question could not be inquired into without the administration of an oath. The County Council had no authority to administer an oath, and, in his opinion, that rendered these appeals a judicial rather than an administrative matter.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said, that the Municipal Councils were at present entrusted with some licensing powers.

MR. DUGDALE said, that appeals against the refusal to grant licences had always been held to be a judicial matter, and were provided for both by the Pawnbrokers and Agricultural Acts. The ordinary procedure was taken in the Court of Quarter Sessions, recognizances were entered into by the persons appealing to be paid the cost of the appeal, and it was impossible to say that appeals of this character could be regarded as administrative business.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) said, he thought that no sufficient reason had been assigned by the President of the Local Government Board for his own change of opinion.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 171; Noes 246: Majority 75.—(Div. List, No. 158.)

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.), in moving, in page 3, line 28, leave out the word "pauper" in Sub-section (vii.), said, the sub-section transferred to the County Councils—

"The provision, enlargement, maintenance, management, and visitation of, and other dealing with asylums for pauper lunatics."

He did not see that the Amendment would interfere in any respect with the meaning of the sub-section. That was not his object; but that was the first place in the Bill in which the word "pauper" occurred, and he thought it was proper to make a proposal to change the word "pauper" into some other word. The suggestion he would make was that they should omit the word "pauper" wherever it appeared in the Bill, and should insert some such words as "industrial pensioner." [Laughter.] He would state his reasons briefly for making the proposal. The term "pauper," which, no doubt, was a very correct one as introduced by its user, had become associated in the minds of the great mass of the people with parish relief in a manner that made its employment a very offensive term. They all knew that it was used in a manner to reflect discredit and, in many cases, shame upon the person who was under the necessity of asking for parish relief. His contention was, that a man who had pursued an honest and laborous life, and had worked for a wage, and found it impossible to make provision for old age, ought to be maintained by the country which he had enriched by his labour, without being, at the same time, associated with a most objectionable epithet. That was the object he had in view, and he was sure that hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House would withdraw the laugh of derision with which they had greeted his original mention of the term "industrial pensioner." He wished to mention a particular case which was brought home to his mind, and which occurred in a great agricultural district. Passing along the road one day, he came across a poor blind man seated on the road side. Entering into conversation with him, he learned that for 40 years the man had worked on a farm doing all the important duties attached to a farm labourer for a very low wage—indeed, so low that it rendered it impossible for the man to make provision against sickness, to say nothing of old age, or of injury such as he had met with. In the course of his labours he was the victim of an accident which disabled him for life, and this man, after 40 years' daily labour on the farm on which he had been employed as man and boy, was turned adrift, without one penny of compensation, or the slightest consideration, by the person by whom he had been employed, and sentenced to spend the remainder of his life, not only under the terrible affliction of the loss of eyesight, which no one could help, but with the additional pain and humiliation of having to live on 2s. a-week and a stone of flour, doled out to him with a grudging hand by the parish authorities, his wife having to walk miles in order to bring that allowance home to his little cottage. What he asked was that the offensive term "pauper" should not be applied to a case like that. There was no more honourable man in Great Britain, and none more worthy of respect and sympathy, than this aged farm labourer, and yet there he was, with his wife, living a hard and lonely life, stigmatized by the objectionable phrase of a "pauper," when he was well entitled to all that could be provided for him in a country which he had laboured to enrich. He mentioned that special case, not because it was singular in its incidents, but because it illustrated hundreds and thousands of other cases that had occurred, and would occur again. He maintained that all persons who laboured for a wage so low that it was quite impossible for them to make provision for their after-life should be maintained by the country without the slightest stigma attaching to them by the use of the offensive term "pauper" as it was commonly applied. He was sure that this was a matter which would receive the sympathy of every hon. Member of that House. Perhaps there might be some difficulty in changing the term "pauper" into that of "industrial pensioner." He was not prepared to deny the difficulty; on the contrary, he believed that it would be very great indeed; but as this was the first case in which the term occurred in this Bill, he thought that unless he made known his desire in this particular instance, if he attempted to move a new term later on, he might be ruled out of Order, because the use of the term would then have become part and parcel of the Bill. He saw one of the hon. Members for the City of Norwich present, and he might say that the case to which he had referred came under his notice within a very short distance of the hon. Gentleman's home, so that probably the hon. Member was acquainted with it as well as he was. He was therefore satisfied that the hon. Member, with his high character of great kindness, would come to his assistance in the effort he was making to show some consideration for the deserving poor of the country. He was of opinion that under no circumstances and in no condition should labouring men have applied to them this offensive term in their old age, and he trusted that hon. Members on both sides of the House would come to his assistance and help him in substituting some other phrase or some other term for the offensive one which he proposed to omit. He had endeavoured to put in the fewest words possible his objection to this term, and all he desired was that the President of the Local Government Board should see his way to the insertion of some other term which would meet the case, and then, in the course of time, opportunities might be afforded for eliminating the word from other measures. That, however, could be provided for in the present clause, by stating that the term he suggested should be used in all other cases in which the term "pauper" occurred.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had not understood the purport of the Amendment when the hon. Member rose to move it, but it was clearly a proposal outside the scope of the Bill. It would clearly not be in Order to strike out the word in this sub-section, because the effect would be to transfer to the County Councils the management and visitation of all lunatic asylums.

MR. BROADHURST said, he wished to understand whether the Chairman ruled that he could not proceed further with the Amendment, but that any alteration must be effected by new legislation? If that were so, he begged to give Notice that, as soon as possible, he would bring in a Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the same remark would apply to the next Amendment which appeared on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare), and which was as follows:—

“The purchase or otherwise freeing from tolls of any markets, the tolls, rents, or profits from which at present belong to private persons, and the making of bye-laws for the regulation and control of all markets thus purchased or acquired: Provided that, in the case of markets belonging to any borough or municipality, the corporation or town council of such borough or municipality shall have the power of making such bye-laws.”

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked, on the point of Order, whether it would be possible for him to place the Amendment down for a subsequent clause?

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was quite in Order to put it down for a new clause, for, although he was not aware of the fact, it might be found to relate to some subsequent clause.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.), in moving, in line 31, after “industrial schools,” to add “and the visitation of prisons,” explained that the object of the Amendment was to transfer the duties connected with the visitation of prisons from the Visiting Committee of Quarter Sessions to the new County Councils. At present the Quarter Sessions were empowered to appoint a Committee from their own Body to visit the prisons, and the object of the Amendment was to take away that power from the Quarter Sessions and to give it to the County Councils. Since the Prisons’ Act of 1877, the powers of the Visiting Committee had been a mere shadow of those which they formerly enjoyed, and practically the powers of the Committee were limited now to reporting to the Home Office and making recommendations. The value of a Visiting Committee was that it threw a little light upon the internal arrangement of the prisons, and acquainted the outer world with what went on. He had no desire to increase the powers at present enjoyed by the Visiting Committee, nor was it any part of his case that the magistrates did improperly discharge their functions in that respect. He asked for this transfer for the same reason which formed the basis of the Bill—namely, that more confidence was likely to be reposed in elected representatives than in a Visiting Committee appointed by the magistrates. Perhaps he might be permitted to say that there seemed to be at the present moment a growing distrust and suspicion in regard to our prison discipline. The idea prevailed that the prison discipline was cruel and oppressive; that in many cases it had broken down the constitution of persons sent to prison for short terms of imprisonment for comparatively venial crimes; and that it had more or less indirectly produced fatal results. It was their desire that a popularly elected Body should have the power of inquiring into the management of their prisons, and reforming any abuses which might be proved to exist. He, therefore, begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 31, after the word “schools,” to add the words “and the visitation of prisons.”—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.) said, the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member were deserving of consideration; but he would point out that they had no application to the present clause. The administration of prisons was entirely in the hands of the Prison Commission, governed by rules framed by successive Secretaries of State. It was not left either to Prison Committees or to the Governors of prisons. The question of prison discipline was one of great difficulty and anxiety. Possibly it might be a serious question whether the present system was not too severe, having regard to the health of the prisoners as well as their reformation. Perhaps the question was one that was eminently worthy of consideration, and ought to be reviewed from time to time ; but he would point out that, at present, they could absolutely do nothing. They had no control over the prison rules, or any functions in connection with the administration of prisons generally. The functions of the Prison Committee were mainly judicial. The clause merely affected the transfer of powers, and did not affect the law. If the hon. Member would look at Sections 12 and 14 of the Prisons Act of 1877 he would find that Parliament intended to limit the punishing power of the Governor over a refractory and insubordinate prisoner, and to leave the ultimate decision in such a case to the Visiting Justices. That was an important question, and would be much more properly left in the hands of the Justices, who were accustomed to deal with matters of punishment, rather than to leave it to the County Councils, who could not be so well fitted as a body of Justices chosen for the purpose. Even in a borough, as the hon. Member was aware, it was not the Town Council who appointed the Visiting Committee for the prisons, but the borough Justices.

MR. PICKERSGILL said, he was quite aware that the Justices had no control over the discipline; but he understood that it was part of their duty and practice to make reports and recommendations to the Home Office ; and it seemed to him that the making of such reports and recommendations would be more properly in the hands of the representatives of the people than in those of mere nominees of the magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had pointed out a difficulty in regard to the duty imposed upon the Judges in their being empowered to inflict corporal punishment on refractory and insubordinate prisoners. He would suggest, therefore, by way of compromise, what he thought would meet the difficulty pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary—namely, that they should follow the analogy contained in this very Bill in regard to pauper lunatic asylums in the 7th clause, by which the management of such asylums was in the first place vested in the County Councils, but by the 7th clause power was reserved to appoint a Visiting Committee. He thought there ought to be some reciprocity. If the arrangement to which he had referred in regard to pauper lunatic asylums were reasonable and satisfactory, it seemed to him that while the control of the prisons was vested in the Home Office, it was only reasonable to give to the County Councils a concurrent right of visitation with the Justices.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was afraid that it was not possible to accept the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman. His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had pointed out very clearly that there were certain duties imposed upon the Justices with respect of the visitation of prisons, and that certain powers were placed in their hands which were of an important character. He understood the hon. Gentleman to suggest that these powers should not be obligatory, but permissive. The Government did not think that that would be satisfactorily carrying out the provisions of the existing law. As his right hon. Friend had pointed out, this Bill did not propose to alter the existing law, and therefore it was desirable to adhere to the clause as it stood.

MR. PICKERSGILL said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman properly understood the suggestion he had made. The idea was to give to the County Councils a concurrent right of visitation with the Justices.

MR. RITCHIE said, that nobody could say that the existing law had not been properly and efficiently administered. He therefore could not accept the suggestion, and the Amendment was really beyond the scope of the clause.

MR. CONYBEARE said, that revelations were constantly taking place, not only in regard to Irish prisons, but to English prisons also. A great deal of monstrous brutality had been shown to exist in our present system, and as a matter of policy, if upon no other ground, the citizens of this country represented by the County Councils should know something as to the condition of the prisons and the methods of treatment adopted in them. He was not prepared to discuss now whether the Penal Code ought to be amended, or whether a change should be introduced into the whole system on which the treatment of our prisoners was based. We had embodied in the law the system of visitation by Justices, because it was considered a wholesome corrective against any evils which might possibly have crept into the administration of our prison discipline. He was not asserting that the Justices of the Peace had failed in their duty, or that the County Councils should have a concurrent power of visitation on account of any dereliction of duty on the part of the Justices of the Peace; but he considered it desirable that the County Councils should have the power to appoint members of their Body to visit the prisons and see what took place in them. Presumably the burden of maintaining the prisons rested on the shoulders of the ratepayers, and through their popularly constituted representatives in the County Councils they ought to have some control over what went on, consistently with a fair view of humanity and justice. It did not seem to him to be any reason for refusing the Amendment, because it went beyond the particular proposal contained in the section. There were grounds of humanity on which this small concession to the public opinion of the country ought to be made. All he could say was that if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board and the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary did not believe the statements which were made as to the inhuman manner in which the prisoners were treated, they would have cause to change their opinion before very long. He regarded the Amendment as a very reasonable one, and trusted that the Committee would accept it.

MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon) said, the facts of the case did not bear out the statement which had just been made by the hon. Gentleman opposite. The Court of Quarter Sessions of which he was a member always gave the jury an opportunity of inspecting the prisons, and he had never heard of a single complaint.

MR. CONYBEARE said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had only to look at the newspapers in order to see the evidence on which he based his plan.

MR. HASTINGS (Worcestershire, E.) said, the argument was that the County Councils ought to be able to send special representatives to visit the prisoners, because the burden of maintaining the prisons fell upon the ratepayers. Now, it did not fall upon the ratepayers at all; for since the Prisons' Act was passed the expense of maintaining the prisons was provided by a Vote in that House.

Therefore the ratepayers of the county had no ground for interference. It would be just as reasonable to propose that the County Councils should have power to send representatives to inspect the convict prisons, which were similarly supported by the Imperial Exchequer. He might also point out, as had been clearly stated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green, who moved the Amendment, was entirely mistaken as to the functions of the Visiting Committee. The hon. Member said the functions were not in any way judicial. Now, as a matter of fact, they were altogether judicial. He had been Chairman of the Visiting Committee of the county of Worcestershire ever since the Prison Act passed, and he was bound to say that all the duties that Committee performed inside the prisons were entirely judicial. All complaints were judicially investigated, and, if necessary, witnesses were heard on oath. With very slight exceptions, all the powers exercised in the prisons respecting punishment were administered by the Visiting Committee, who only gave their judgment after having heard evidence on oath. So far from the ratepayers having anything to do with the matter, they had been relieved altogether from the burden of maintaining prisons since the passing of the Prisons Act.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, that if he had any doubt whether he should support the Amendment that doubt had been removed by the speech which had just been delivered. He had some little doubt at first whether these words ought to be inserted, but now he had none. He wished to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board and the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that nobody asked to have the judicial duties of the magistrates transferred to the County Councils. The whole of the clause was governed by the first three or four lines, which said—

“There shall be transferred to the council of each county, on and after the appointed day, the administrative business of the justices of the county in quarter sessions or any committee appointed by the quarter sessions assembled, that is to say, all business done by the quarter sessions, in respect of the several matters following—namely,” and so on. All the judicial business was reserved to the Visiting Justices, and the administrative business was handed over to the County Councils. There was evidently a desire, however, to limit the transfer of administrative duties to the new County Councils as far as possible. It was the old story. They wanted to get rid of the County Councils by giving them nothing to do, and by making them subordinate to the Justices. He thought that the sooner they came to close quarters with that principle the better. The true principle of the Bill was that not on the ground of misconduct, or of incompetency, or of inefficiency, but on the ground of public policy, it was desirable to transfer to a popular Body, elected by the county, duties hitherto discharged by the magistrates. They must accept that position all through. Nobody objected to the Justices having power to inflict punishment on prisoners confined in the county prisons; but the duties of the Visiting Committee, which Lord Cross carefully considered when he transferred the jurisdiction from the Local Authorities to the Crown, ought to be placed in the hands of the County Councils. What were those duties? They were to visit the prisons frequently, to report on any matters that might require a report, to take cognizance of any matters of pressing necessity, and to enter any observations they might consider desirable as to the condition of the prisons and abuses in the visitors' book kept by the gaoler. He was not going into the question raised by his hon. Friend below the Gangway, as this was not a proper time to discuss our prison administration. His own opinion was that it was unnecessarily severe, and he believed that when Parliament had time to consider it, it would be inclined to reform the present system of administration. Certainly on the other side of the water there were tendencies to great severity in their prison life. Hitherto, Amendments had been opposed because they might possibly introduce a dangerous principle when they came to be applied to Ireland; but he advocated this Amendment because it would be advantageous when it came to be applied to Ireland. He thought it was most desirable that people elected by a popular Body should be able to enter the Irish prisons and ascertain what went on there. Without desiring to cast any reflection upon the English magistrates, who certainly discharged their duty very differently from the magistrates of Ireland, he thought it was desirable that the principle of popular representation should be applied to the inspection of prisons, so that they might secure the proper administration of justice, and prevent any unnecessary severity being inflicted in carrying out the law. Therefore, if his hon. Friend went to a Division he should support him, although it might be necessary to introduce some other words into the Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, he should certainly feel bound to support the Amendment. He attached enormous importance to a visitation on the part of persons who might be taken to represent the public interest in the prisons. He had felt that very much himself when he was at the Home Office, and had done everything he could to strengthen the case of the Visiting Justices, as he believed they had invariably acknowledged; but there was no judicial function in these visitations of prisons any more than there was in the visitation of asylums. The magistrates had a great deal to do in committing persons to asylums as well as to prisons, and he could not see any reason why the visitation of prisons should not be left in the hands of a Committee of the County Council. It was highly desirable that the public should have the means of knowledge as to the administration of prison discipline, and that would be felt as a protection both to the Government and to the public. He had always thought it an enormous danger, when the prisons were originally transferred to the Government, that there might arise in the mind of the public a supposition of undue severity or injustice being exercised in the prison administration. He was sorry to see that there was a disposition on the part of the Committee to distrust the County Councils. All the attempts to eviscerate this clause and to diminish the power of the Council arose from a jealousy of the Council, and he was afraid that hon. Gentlemen opposite were going to take enormous pains to create a Body at a great expenditure which, after all, would have little or nothing to do. There seemed to be a disposition to take out one power after another. The licensing power had already been struck out. Sub-section 6 had just gone. He did not know why or wherefore they could object to entrust so small a power to the Body they were creating. It appeared to him that when the Bill left the House it would be little more than an old turnpike trust. If hon. Members would take the pains to look at the Bill and see what the Council would have to do when it was created, they would find that it would have to look after the main roads and the county bridges; that it would be a Visiting Committee, as far as the asylums were concerned; and that it would have a certain power with reference to wild birds and contagious diseases in animals. Those were the whole of the functions of this great measure of local government which they were creating for England. They omitted everything relating to licensing, and they objected to entrust the Councils with the power of visiting the prisons. What, then, did they leave for the County Councils to do? He would like every hon. Member to look into the Bill, and see what these Councils would have to do when they were created. The duty of interposing between the public and the Government in regard to the administration of prison discipline was one of the most proper functions which could be conferred upon the County Councils, and if it were only upon the ground that the Amendment would give the County Councils something to do he would support it. Hon. Members ought to take care that they did not bring this great Body into contempt.

MR. MATTHEWS said, the right hon. Gentleman had made what he might call a second reading speech. It showed, however, that the right hon. Gentleman had very improperly read the Bill; that he had not read the Amendment at all; and that he had entirely forgotten the provisions of the Prisons Act, because he had added something to it which did not exist.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had been speaking of the last Amendment which the Government had struck out.

MR. MATTHEWS said, the right hon. Gentleman was certainly out of Order in discussing an Amendment which had been disposed of.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that what he had said was that the Government had eviscerated the Bill by striking out a portion of the powers they were prepared originally to grant.

MR. MATTHEWS said, that this was a proposition to take away from the Visiting Justices functions which they performed under the Prisons Act, and to transfer them to the County Councils. The right hon. Gentleman said that those functions were not judicial; but he must have forgotten the provisions of the Prisons Act. Those functions are peculiarly judicial, seeing that they relate to the punishment of prisoners. The Prisons Act of 1855 empowered the Justices to take evidence upon oath, and determine concerning any report made to them that a prisoner had been guilty of any particular offence against prison discipline. Rule 59 provided that no prisoner was to be put in irons, or to be put into mechanical restraint unless the particulars were at once entered, and no prisoner was to be confined for more than 24 hours in a separate cell unless the time during which he was to be confined separately was specified by the magistrates. Moreover, the Visiting Committee of Justices were empowered to take cognizance of any matters of pressing necessity not within the power of their commission as Justices, and to perform such duties as they might be required to perform. The members of the County Council could not perform those functions, because they were not members of the Commission of the Peace. Under another provision of the Prisons Act of 1877, the Visiting Committee could not punish an offender except by an order of two Justices of the Peace, and after an inquiry upon oath. That was altogether a judicial function. There was no power whatever on the part of the members of County Councils to administer an oath. The power to administer an oath was given to the Justices simply because they held the Commission of the Peace. It might be that some powers of visiting the prisons could be usefully conferred on the County Council; but it must be entirely apart from the judicial functions which the Prisons Act empowered the Justices to perform.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, that that was the main duty which the Visiting Committee would have to perform.

MR. MATTHEWS said, that he was aware that it was one duty, and that words to that effect were inserted in the Act of 1877 as a sop to the magistrates when the principal part of their control was taken away.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he should like to meet the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary if he was disposed to consider favourably the transfer of any part of the visiting powers to the Council, which, after all, composed nine-tenths of the work. He would be satisfied if the corrective powers were retained in the hands of the magistrates, and the general visiting functions were transferred to the County Councils. He should be very well satisfied with an arrangement of that kind, and on that footing he would assent to the retention of the corrective power of punishment in the hands of the magistrates.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) said, he wished to make an observation from the point of view of a practical man. When the prisoners were walking round and round the prison yard, and visitors appeared at the door, the prisoners were ordered to halt, so that any man who had a complaint to prefer might come forward. He believed that a prisoner, if he had legitimate cause of complaint—which sometimes might arise, even in an English prison—would be much more likely to come forward and report the views to a member of a popularly elected Council than to a Justice of the Peace, who was appointed from a class which, rightly or wrongly, he had been taught to consider in direct opposition to his own. Therefore, he hoped his hon. Friend would take the sense of the House by pressing the Amendment to a Division.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, he wished to say one word in answer to the statement which had just been made. He had been a visiting magistrate for many years, and he had invariably carried out this rule—that whenever he entered the cell with a brother magistrate to listen to the complaints of a prisoner no official should be allowed to be present. He believed that that was the usual practice that prevailed, and though the management of the gaols had been taken away from the magistrates, and vested in the Government, the visiting magistrates never neglected their duty of visiting, and inquiring carefully into any complaints the prisoners had to make.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM said, he did not wish to impugn the statement of the hon. and gallant Baronet, but he thought that if inquiry were made into the matter it would be found that the course he had referred to was not invariably pursued.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield) said, he desired to express his concurrence with the remarks which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) had made as to the great importance of transferring, wherever it could be done properly, the functions of the magistrates to the County Councils. He sincerely trusted that the Government, although unable to accept this particular Amendment, would consent to transfer to the County Councils the general visiting functions, while retaining the judicial functions in the hands of the Justices. He believed that such a provision would tend to increase the importance of the County Councils.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, he should like to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to an extremely important precedent on this point—namely, the precedent of the Visiting Committee appointed under the Scotch Prisons Act of 1877. By that Act, which was modelled upon the English Act, the Visiting Committee need not be Justices. The section provided that a Visiting Committee should be appointed for every prison under the Act, and that it should consist of a certain number of persons being Commissioners of Supply and Justices of the Peace. Now, what were the Commissioners of Supply? They were exactly the same order of persons, and entrusted with very much the same functions, as the County Councils now proposed to be constituted.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.) said, he maintained that it should be an important part of the new Body about to be created to administer the business of the county and visit the prisons, in order that they might, without the presence of the officials, ascertain what the treatment of the prisoners was. If it were necessary, he could point out various abuses of which he knew something personally. The administration of the present system was simply delegated to nominees of the Government. He was anxious that the duties should be transferred to persons who were responsible to the people, and on those grounds he hoped his hon. Friend would press the Amendment.

MR. PICKERSGILL said, he simply rose to say that he cordially accepted the suggestion which had been made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Derby. If the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would give a distinct pledge that on a subsequent part of the Bill he would introduce words that would have the effect of transferring to the County Councils the visiting powers, properly so called, of the Justices, reserving to the Justices the judicial functions in regard to the infliction of punishment, he would be prepared to withdraw the Amendment. But if a distinct pledge of that kind was not given he was afraid that it would be necessary to carry the Amendment to a Division.

MR. RITCHIE said, that he could not give any such pledge to the hon. Gentleman. The precedent quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. John Morley) was not exactly on all fours, because the power of a Visiting Committee in England were not the same as those in Scotland. So far as he could say, no judicial powers were exercised by Visiting Committees in Scotland at all. If the Government were to retain the judicial powers in the hands of the Justices and to transfer the other powers to the County Councils, the effect would be to set up two Visiting Committees, which the Government did not think at all desirable. He was afraid, therefore, that he could not give the undertaking asked for by the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green. The argument of the Government was that the powers conferred by Act of Parliament on the Justices were judicial, and they desired to retain in the hands of the Justices the judicial functions now exercised by them.

MR. STANSFELD said, they had been discussing a question on the larger issue, whether all the administration as to lunatic asylums and prisons should not be subjected to the visitation and supervision, not only of the county magistrates, but of the members of the County Council. He entertained a strong opinion upon that subject; and either on the present, or some other occasion, he hoped that some proposal would be made in regard to it which would be pressed to a Division. His own opinion was that there was no necessity to wait for another opportunity, but that this was the right occasion to raise the discussion if it were considered desirable. It was admitted that some of the functions of the Visiting Justices were not judicial, and might be performed by persons who were not Justices of the Peace; for instance, the 4th section of the Prisons Act required a report to be sent in as to the condition of the prisons, and also as to any repairs that might be necessary. Surely it was not necessary that a Visiting Committee should have the powers of Justices of the Peace in order to present a report in cases of that kind. He maintained that the Amendment of his hon. Friend was perfectly right in its present form. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board gave it as a reason why they ought not to accept the Amendment that it was not desired that they should have two Bodies possessing administrative functions; but the Committee had already provided that that was to be the case in regard to the lunatic asylums.

MR. RITCHIE said, it was not desirable to lay down that principle as a general proposition.

MR. STANSFELD said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to lay down as a general proposition that the institutions in a county should not be visited by more than one Committee, but he now appeared to confine himself to the case of prisons. He and his hon. Friends on that side of the House were not satisfied that prisoners in a county should be visited simply by the Justices; and they demanded that they should be visited also by the representatives of the people—that not only the Justices, but the delegates of the people at large should be admitted within the precincts of the prisons. This Bill, in reference to lunatic asylums, transferred certain administrative functions from the Quarter Sessions to the County Councils; and in the 6th clause it reserved the right of the Quarter Sessions to appoint a Visiting Committee also. He saw no reason why the same principles which prevailed as to asylums should not obtain with regard to prisons; and if his hon. Friend went to a Division he should have great satisfaction in voting with him.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, North-wich) asked if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board meant to tell the Committee that there was no administrative business in connection with the prisons which would concern the County Councils? Surely, the matter of repairs referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax formed part of the administrative business. He would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, and to hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, to allow the Amendment to be passed, for this reason—that the present management of our prisons was very far from what it ought to be. He was convinced that many prisoners were at the present moment unwisely treated, and that they were teaching the people whom they put in prison to hate work. Most of those who are in prison went there because they did not like work, and the prison rules taught them to hate it.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) said, he was afraid that they were engaged in the erection of machinery which, after they had created it, would have very little work to do. Nearly all the improvements in prison discipline had come not from the prison magistrates, but had come from persons outside, such as the Howard Society. He cordially supported the Amendment.

MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouthshire, W.) said, no one could dispute that the Visiting Committee had double functions to discharge. What was desired was that the representatives of the people should perform those functions which were strictly called judicial, and that members of the Council elected by the people should be able to go and inspect the prisons, confer with the prisoners, and receive complaints and make a report and entries in the visiting book. That was all that was intended by the Amendment of his hon. Friend, and there was no desire that the judicial functions performed by the magistrates should be transferred by the County Councils.

Mr. Stansfeld

MR. BARING (London), in moving the following Amendment, in page 3, line 37, at end, to insert "except the clerk of the peace and every clerk to justices in petty sessions," said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had been kind enough to inform him that the question to which this Amendment related was settled by Clauses 82 and 83. He (Mr. Baring) had read those clauses with considerable care, and, as far as he was able to understand them, though he might possibly be wrong in his interpretation of them, they referred merely to the payment of the fees, whereas the present clause related to the fixing of the fees. If he was wrong in this view, he should, of course, have nothing to do but withdraw the Amendment; but he desired to hear what the right hon. Gentleman had to say upon the subject.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 37, at end, to insert the words "except the clerk of the peace and every clerk to justices in petty sessions."—(Mr. Baring.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, that Clauses 82 and 83 appeared to go beyond his hon. Friend's proposal. The words of Clause 82 were—

"For the purpose of the enactments relating to such salary and fees, the standing joint committee of the county council and the quarter sessions shall be substituted for the quarter sessions and the local authority respectively."

In reference to clerks of Petty Sessions, the 83rd clause provided that—

"In the enactments relating to such salaries and fees the said standing joint committee shall be substituted for the quarter sessions and the local authority respectively."

He was advised that it was not necessary to insert his hon. Friend's Amendment, because its object was fully covered by these words. If, however, that turned out to be not the case, he would take care, on Report, to amend the clause.

SIR JOHN DORINGTON (Gloucester, Tewkesbury) said, the fees paid to Clerks of the Peace and Clerks of Petty Sessions were judicial fees, and the Quarter Session Court was, by Statute, authorized and obliged to draw up scales of the amounts to be paid. The amounts of such fees ought to be left to the determination of the Court of Quarter Sessions.

MR. RITCHIE said, he hoped his hon. Friend would be content to accept the assurance that if Clauses 82 and 83 did not carry out that which was the hon. Gentleman's intention and his own, he would take care to put the matter right on Report.

MR. BARING asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BRUNNER said, he wished to move the insertion of the words "chief constable" after the word "of," in line 39. He was very anxious to see good relations maintained between the people and those who had authority over them; and he, therefore, desired that the determination of the Chief Constable's salary should be placed in the hands of the County Councils.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Mr. Chairman, I rise to Order. I wish to know, Sir, whether the question which the hon. Member is now raising was not settled by the Division taken on Friday upon the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage)?

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment then moved embraced both the appointment of the Chief Constable and the control of the police. I think that, technically, this Amendment may be moved again; but I do not think the hon. Member is exercising a very wise discretion in proposing it.

MR. BRUNNER said, he thought the discretion to which the hon. Gentleman the Chairman referred was not altogether in his own hands. He was very desirous that the salaries of all the officials should be left to the determination of the Council, because he thought that in all Departments of the Public Service taxation and representation should go together. He was not going to speak at length on the subject, and had only a few more words to say about it. He wanted the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to consider whether he could not, by introducing a fresh provision somewhere in the Bill, encourage County Councils to appoint bankers as their treasurers. Bankers would undertake the work of treasurers without payment, and they would perform the duties appertaining to that office with efficiency, and in a very business-like manner. He might remind the right hon. Gentleman of what he knew well, that a very large number of Local Authorities now employed bankers as their treasurers.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. BRUNNER said, he had nothing more to say about the Amendment, and he commended it to the Committee as one that they would do wisely to adopt.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 39, after the word "of," to insert the words "Chief Constable."—(Mr. Brunner.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, he only wished to say one word about the Amendment, as, after what the Chairman had said, he did not think it would be wise to continue the discussion. The Committee had undoubtedly considered the question in connection with the police already, and had taken a Division upon it. He thought that the argument in favour of rejecting this Amendment was much stronger now than it was before the Division was taken on Friday evening.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he wished to point out that the discussion on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) respecting the police had not nearly concluded when the Division was taken on Friday evening. He would not venture upon forbidden ground; but he thought that everybody who was present during the last hour of the discussion on Friday would agree with him that it was through the excessive impatience of hon. Gentlemen opposite that the discussion was curtailed. Many of those who had wished to address the Committee on Friday felt that they were entitled to say something on the subject now. But, whether they did so or not, the mere fact that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby was rejected on Friday could not be held to exclude all discussion on the question of the police.

An Amendment on the subject was to be moved on the 7th clause, and he hoped that it would not be ruled out of Order when reached. As to the present Amendment, he should like to emphasize what his hon. Friend the Member for Northwich (Mr. Brunner) had stated as to the importance of maintaining the principle that the elected representatives of the people on the Council Councils should have the control of the appointment and the fixing of the salary of the Chief Constable. It would not be denied that the office of Chief Constable was an exceedingly important one, and that that functionary had the chief control of the police, although the decision of certain questions respecting the regulation and efficiency of the police was assigned by the Bill to various authorities. The Joint Committee would have a great deal to say about the management and control of the police, but the Local Government Board or the Home Office, or some central authority, would also, to a large extent, look after the efficiency of the force. Those who sat on the Opposition side of the House felt very strongly that the control of the police, as far as the appointment, pay, and removal of the Chief Constable were concerned, should be in the hands not of a Joint Committee of irresponsible men, but of the elected representatives of the people on the County Council. On this point, he might allude to the difficulties that had arisen lately within a stone's throw of that House in connection with the treatment of the public by the police of the Metropolis. From what he had seen of the temper of the people, he thought that more mischief had been done by the action of the Government and the police in connection with meetings in Trafalgar Square than had been created during the whole time that had elapsed since the Hyde Park riots a good many years ago. Wherever one went in the Metropolis to-day, one found in existence a feeling of exasperation against the police. It was a very great pity that it was so, but this kind of feeling would always be aroused whenever, by the timidity of a mischievous official like the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews), police were directed to trample upon the people. He had taken the trouble to go among the people with the object of ascertaining their feelings on the subject, and he could only say that there was such a feeling of exasperation as it was very dangerous ever to arouse among the populace against the constituted authorities. He would endeavour to illustrate the principle he was fighting for by referring to another case, drawn not from the Metropolis, but from the county with which he had the honour to be connected. He would not refer to the riots which occurred in 1885 in the St. Austell Division, as he preferred to leave the hon. Member for that Division (Mr. W. A. M'Arthur) to deal with them, if he chose to do so. He would, however, allude to the difficulties which occurred in the capital of the Division he represented, the Town of Camborne, some years back. At that time there was exactly the same maltreatment of the people by the police as had been witnessed in the Metropolis within the last few months. In Camborne the police did not, perhaps, ride down the people and massacre them—

MR. W. BECKETT (Notts, Bassett-law): Mr. Chairman, I rise to Order. I beg to ask whether these remarks are in Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is, I believe, coming to the Question. I believe he is merely giving an illustration of his argument.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he was sorry that the hon. Member opposite had not listened to him with sufficient attention to enable him to follow his argument. He had laid down the principle that the control of the police, as far as the appointment of the Chief Constable was concerned, should be in the hands of the elected members of the County Council, and he was giving, as his reason for advocating that principle, facts which many hon. Members might choose to deny, but which were within the knowledge of some of them at any rate. The first series of facts were those connected with Trafalgar Square, and the second series related to his own constituency. Surely a Member of that House had a right to speak about what had happened in his own constituency. On the occasion to which he was referring in Camborne, the police behaved with exceeding roughness, harshness, and brutality to the people. The consequence was that there were riots in Camborne, as there would always be in a place where the people were treated with injustice, and where a feeling of indignation and exasperation was aroused. For his own part, he wished to see maintained the respect which the people of this country always held for the constituted authorities. That respect was being slowly sapped and undermined by the action of the present Government. It was to a great extent undermined by the action of the police at Camborne on the occasion to which he was referring. The police used to go about the streets and deliberately hustle the poor men with the view of raising a charge against them of being drunk and of putting them into the lock-up. This occurred repeatedly, and the result was that riots took place. The consequence was that the Chief Constable of the county, who was not a brave man, took to his heels, and, he believed, had never shown his face in Camborne since. He would give the Committee one more illustration, and he thought it a very pertinent and important one, of what was likely to happen in Devon under this Bill. The measure proposed to turn into separate counties all boroughs in which the population amounted to or exceeded 50,000. The result would be that Devonport and Plymouth would each become counties in themselves, whilst Stonehouse would still form part of the County of Devon. Devonport and Stonehouse formed one borough for Parliamentary purposes, but were divided for local purposes. In Stonehouse the police were under the control of the irresponsible magistracy of the county, whilst in Devonport they were under the management of the Municipal Authorities. The residents of Stonehouse and Devonport respectively said that there was all the difference in the world between the treatment of the people by the police in one place and their treatment in the other.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has been allowed great latitude. He is not at all speaking to this special Amendment, which in itself is only technical.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he did not wish for a moment to transgress the Chairman's ruling, or to pursue the matter further. He might, perhaps, have some other opportunity of referring to the subject. He was only anxious to impress upon the Committee the importance of maintaining the principle that the police should be controlled by the representatives of the people. If the people controlled their Chief Constable, they could, at any rate, indirectly control their police. The Members of the Opposition were satisfied that they were doing their duty in taking their stand upon that principle. No doubt the Supporters of the Government would over-rule them if they went to a Division; but he thought that the people of the country would approve their action in having insisted upon giving to the people the control of the police.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, that, as he understood the Bill, the control of the police was to be vested jointly in the Justices and the County Councils, but that the Justices were to appoint and the Council was to pay the Chief Constable. This seemed to him to be a very inconvenient arrangement. In his opinion, if the County Council was to pay for the police officers, it was most reasonable that it should appoint them. The joint committee would have a very inefficient control over the police if the appointment of the Chief Constable rested solely with the Justices. He thought that the appointment of the Chief Constable should rest with the County Council alone, although he admitted that the Committee had already accepted what he regarded as the bad system of joint control.

MR. STANSFELD said, he was rather disposed to suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for Northwich (Mr. Brunner) that he should not insist upon carrying his Amendment to a Division. His reasons for saying so were these. Practically speaking, the Committee had decided not to transfer to the County Council the appointment of the Chief Constable; but the Committee had not decided anything with regard to his salary. Whatever reasons there might be in the minds of hon. Members in regard to leaving to the County Council the appointment of Chief Constable, those reasons did not necessarily apply to the payment of the salary, and it was inconsistent to leave the payment of the salary to the County Council and not to leave it the right of determining the duty which was connected with the payment of that salary. This being so, he intended to move the addition of these words to the sub-section—"and the determination of the salary of the Chief Constable." This would, of course, raise the question of the right of the County Council to determine the salary.

MR. BRUNNER said, he did not clearly understand whether his right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) would move the addition of the words he had mentioned if he (Mr. Brunner) withdrew his Amendments?

MR. STANSFELD said, that he did propose to move the addition of those words.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, that as he had proposed the Amendment on Friday, he wished to say that he thought his proposal had then been thoroughly threshed out. He did not see how they were to carry on the Business of that House unless they loyally accepted the decisions which, after full discussion, had been arrived at. Therefore, although he hoped that before many years were over the decision of Friday evening would be reversed, he could not support the Amendment now suggested.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM said, he hoped the Committee, by refusing to accept this Amendment, would show the people of the country for a second time that they regarded them as either idiots or dangerous wild beasts, who were not fit to be trusted with the control of their own police.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, he thought that possibly his right hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had misunderstood the suggestion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld). In the Amendment moved on Friday there was no question of salary.

MR. HENEAGE said, that his Amendment included the words "the appointment," which naturally included "salary." [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Well, that was how he understood his Amendment, which also provided for "the control and the dismissal." In moving the Amendment he had intended to give the County Council full control over the police and the Chief Constable. As the majority had been against him, he accepted the decision of the Committee in good faith.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, his right hon. Friend was perfectly at liberty to accept the decision arrived at on Friday in any sense he pleased, but he must allow other Members to construe the word "appointment" in the sense in which it was ordinarily used. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would hardly contend that the word "appointment" included the fixing of the salary. The Lord Chancellor made many appointments in the course of the year, but he had nothing to do with the fixing of the salary that was attached to those appointments. He did not think the Committee could be justly accused of refusing to accept the decision come to on Friday evening if it adopted the intended proposal of his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax.

MR. RITCHIE said, that what he understood the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax to suggest was, that the Committee, having negatived the proposal to place the appointment of the Chief Constable in the hands of the County Council, should now accept an Amendment which would put the question of the salary of the Chief Constable in the hands of the County Council. Surely this would be absurd. Under Clause 29 of the Bill matters connected with the salary and the payment of the police force would be placed in the hands of the joint committee; and, looking at the fact that the Committee had practically determined that the control and administration of the police should be in the hands of the joint committee, the Government considered that all questions affecting the pay of the police should also be left to the decision of the joint committee.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, that the Committee had not yet come to the decision which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) said they had arrived at. When the right Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) said that the "appointment" included the "salary," he must have forgotten what was the case with reference to boroughs. In the boroughs, whilst the appointment and control of the Chief Constable rested with the Watch Committee, the pay of the Chief Constable rested with the Council. The question of the pay of the Chief Constable was one of great importance, and the Committee could not, he thought, in any way more emphatically show its distrust of the new Councils than by depriving them of the power of the purse. As to the question of whether the pay of the Chief Constable could be regarded as distinct from the decision arrived at on Friday, he might at once tell the Government that when the clause dealing with the appointment of the joint committee came up for consideration, he should certainly, if no one else did, take the sense of the Committee on the question of whether the joint committee should or should not have full control of the Chief Constable as of all other constables. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Northwich (Mr. Brunner) would withdraw his Amendment, as it was really in conflict with the decision arrived at by the Committee on Friday. The proposed Amendment of his right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) would then, in due time, raise the question whether the amount of the salary should not be fixed by the Body which raised the rates.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he wished to ask for the Chairman's ruling on another point of Order. Supposing that the Amendment were not withdrawn, and were agreed to by the Committee, the determination of the salary of the Chief Constable would be transferred to the new Council. That was precisely the proposal that was negatived on Friday, and he wished to know what would be the position of the question under the Bill? Would the appointment of Chief Constable remain as at present intended, or would it also be transferred to the new Council?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that if the Amendment were carried the determination of the salary of the Chief Constable would undoubtedly be vested in the new Council. The decision of Friday last negatived that proposal, not by itself, but by associating it with the proposal that the control of the police should be placed in the hands of the Council. The Amendment was not entirely inconsistent with the decision not to allow the appointment of the Chief Constable to be under the control of the County Council.

MR. BRUNNER asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BRUNNER said, it was provided in the Bill that the Clerk of the Peace should be the Clerk of the County Council, and that seemed to him a terrible infringement of that very good rule, that taxation and representation should go together. Surely the appointment and removal of the Clerk of the Peace, if he was to be the servant of the County Council, should be in the hands of the County Council. With regard to Clerks of Justices, he did not know that he had very much to say; but he felt very strongly upon the appointment, removal, and determination of the salary of the Clerk of the Peace; he was an officer in whom he took a great deal of interest just now.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 2, to leave out from "other than the clerk of the peace and the clerk of the justices."—(Mr. Brunner.)

MR. RITCHIE said, the Clerk of the Peace would be the joint officer of the County Council and Quarter Sessions, and it was desirable, indeed he thought necessary, that his appointment should rest with the Committee composed of half from the Justices and half from the County Council, and which was provided for in Clause 83. So long as the Clerk of the Justices remained the servant of the Justices his appointment remained with the Justices, but so far as his salary was concerned it would be determined by the joint committee. Surely the hon. Member would not advocate that the joint officer should not be under the control of the joint committee?

MR. BRUNNER said, he merely wished that the question of salary should be determined by the representatives of the people who paid the money.

MR. CONYBEARE said, it was quite true that the proposal in the Bill was that the Clerk of the Peace should be the joint officer of the irresponsible body of magistrates and of the County Council, and he held it to be a most mischievous proposal. The Clerk of the County Council should be under the control of the Council, just as the Town Clerk was the servant of a Town Council. He altogether objected to this joint officer. The officer would probably have more than enough to do with his joint duty than he could do well, and his work would be done badly for both his masters. He (Mr. Conybeare) was animated by a desire that these new Councils should have full authority in matters entrusted to them; but the Government were too ready to listen to any suggestion from their Supporters in the direction of emasculating the Bill and making the authority of the Council more shadowy. In every possible way hon. Members showed their distrust of the new Authority, and every attempt to take away the functions and duties of the Council, every limitation of a right the Council might naturally aspire to, would tend to make it impotent and worthless, and a Body that would certainly not attract those men of honour, virtue, and probity, of whom so much had been said. The ratepayers felt strongly that they ought to have control over the salaries of the officers they paid. It was all very well to say this officer would be the Clerk of Quarter Sessions, but he would be paid from the rates, and it was for the ratepayers, through their representatives, to say what he should be paid, not an irresponsible body of magistrates. Beyond that, the Council ought to have full control over their officer. He would have to be constantly in attendance, and would probably take the minutes of proceedings. How would the House of Commons treat a suggestion that the House of Lords should have any control over the payment of the House of Commons clerks?

Question put.

Mr. STANSFELD said, he had now to move an Amendment at the end in reference to the salary of the Chief Constable. He would not labour the point, but simply say the position he took up was that all the salaries payable out of the County rates should be determined by the County Council.

Amendment proposed in page 4, line 2, after the word "justices," to insert the words "and the determination of the salary of the Chief Constable."—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. CONYBEARE, in reference to what had been said, that appointment and removal necessarily included the determination of salary, said it would be in the recollection of the Committee that the Government last year made an appointment to a particular office without determining any salary at all. The late Colonel King-Harman was appointed without any salary, and there was a precedent then for considering separately from the question of appointment, the question of determining salary.

Mr. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, he understood the argument against this proposal to be that those who had appointment and control should have the fixing of the salary. But if that were allowed, it would be the Justices not the joint committee who would fix the salary of the Chief Constable? But he asked, how was it proposed to fix the salary? The argument for the Amendment was simply that those who raised the rates should have the spending of them. That was the whole point and merit of the Bill, that it put the raising and spending of the rates in representative hands. Apart altogether from the vexed question of the control of the police, this question of determining salary should be placed in the hands of the elective Council.

Mr. RITCHIE said, it might or might not be right to give to Quarter Sessions the appointment of Chief Constable, that was a matter not now under discussion; but it was the proposal of the Government in the Bill, and the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman meant that the Body that was to have the appointment of the Chief Constable was to have no voice in the fixing of that officer's remuneration. That was a doctrine the Government did not assent to. If it was right that the appointment should rest with Quarter Sessions, as it did, it was evident that to adopt the Amendment might lead to a conflict between Quarter Sessions and the County Council, and which might result in the Council making such arrangements as would entirely defeat the object of the Bill in leaving the appointment of Chief Constable with the Quarter Sessions. He was not contending now that the appointment should remain with Quarter Sessions; that would be decided presently. All he said was that was the arrangement in the Bill, and he could not consent to taking from the Body having the appointment all voice in fixing the salary.

MR. STANSFELD said, the right hon. Gentleman seemed altogether oblivious of a fact that should be familiar to his Parliamentary and official experience. The House of Commons did not appoint civil servants or officers in the Army and Navy, yet the House of Commons determined what pay they should receive. He urged that in these financial matters, the County Council should be supreme. The representative body ought to have the right of determining the salaries to be paid from the county rates, and on that he should divide.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) said, he might remind the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) that all the occupants of the Government Bench received such remuneration as it pleased the House to vote, but only two official appointments were vested in the House—that of the Speaker and Deputy Speaker; all the other appointments were not in the hands of the House, though the House fixed the salaries. There could not be a more pertinent example opposed to the contention of the President of the Local Government Board.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM said, that was an argument that cut away the ground from the right hon. Gentleman's position. The representatives of those who raised the rates should have control of expenditure, and that was the principle that in the end must be recognized.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 120; Noes 161: Majority 41.—(Div. List, No. 161.)

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) said, the clause as it now stood provided that among the powers of the County Councils there should be the determination of the coroner's salary, and the division of the county into coroners' districts. His Amendment provided that the County Council should also have "the assignment of such districts."

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 6, after the word "district," insert the words "and the assignment of such districts."—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 9, after the word "election," insert the words "the place of holding courts for the revision of the lists of voters."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. BRUNNER proposed to insert, after the words just inserted, the words, "Provided that no selected Councillors shall have a vote in respect of such matters." He desired that the County Council should be, like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion. There was, unfortunately, a feeling widely prevalent that men who did not owe their position to free election by their fellows, were not so fully to be trusted in such matters as the County Councils would have to deal with, as they ought to be. Personally, he did not suppose for a moment that the selected Councillors would do anything to secure a Party triumph. He had never found amongst the Justices of Cheshire an inclination to snatch a Party advantage in the settlement of affairs; but it was simply because he desired there should be no possible suspicion that a Party advantage was attempted, that he proposed that the selected Councillors should not have a vote in respect of such matters.

Amendment proposed, after the words last inserted, to insert the words "provided that no selected Councillors shall have a vote in respect of such matters."—(Mr. Brunner.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, the Government could not accept the Amendment, as it was quite impossible to put the Aldermen in an inferior position to any other members of the Council.

MR. CONYBEARE said, the right hon. Gentleman forgot that the First Lord of the Treasury had given a sort of undertaking that the question of Aldermen would be re-considered.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) begged that the hon. Gentleman would not misrepresent him. He distinctly stated, in reply to a question put to him, that they saw no reason to re-consider the question.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM said, there was one argument which might be used with advantage. The House of Lords stood in a similar position to the House of Commons as the selected Councillors would stand to the elected Councillors. The House of Lords were not allowed any control over the money of the State. He thought the same principle might with advantage be followed in the case of selected and elected Councillors.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. C. HALL (Cambridge, Chesterton) said, the object of the Amendment which stood in his name was simply to enable the County Council to take advantage of the Local Stamp Act, if they should think fit. By that Act the Justices had the power to receive the fees for contentious and non-contentious business under the Local Stamp Act if they thought fit, and a great many Justices had taken advantage of that Act, and now did their work entirely by means of stamps. If this Amendment were carried, it would be open to the County Council to adopt the Act, and so be able to carry on their business in the same way as the Justices had done.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 14, after the word "meters," to insert the words "and of the Local Stamp Act."—(Mr. C. Hall.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. FIRTH said, he would like to know whether this sub-section was intended to apply to London, and whether it was proposed to consider all the propositions affecting London separately.

MR. RITCHIE said, that all these clauses applied to County Councils set up, and in that case applied to London. But it was quite open for them when they came to London, to consider the peculiar circumstances of London, and make special provisions.

MR. BRUNNER proposed an Amendment, to leave out the words from "the confirmation" in line 23, to "and ten" in line 26. It seemed to him that the County Council was entirely unfitted to deal with the rules of loan societies. Loan societies were by no means confined to counties. He knew loan societies whose action extended over the whole country, and, therefore, he hoped that the words he proposed to omit would not be allowed to remain in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 23, to leave out the words from "the confirmation" to the words "and ten" in line 26, inclusive.—(Mr. Brunner.)

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not see any reason why these duties should be withdrawn from the County Council, who he thought would be quite able to undertake them.

MR. BRUNNER asked, to whom was the confirmation of loan societies' rules to be left. Loan societies had offices in many counties, and how was it to be decided which County Council should confirm the rules? He thought the matter had better be left as it was, or that the right hon. Gentleman should consider whether he had better not take it out of the hands of the Quarter Sessions and keep it in his own hands.

MR. RITCHIE said, that that was a separate matter. This seemed to him one of those administrative matters which ought to be transferred to the County Council.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. FIRTH said, that they had now reached Sub-section XVI., would the right hon. Gentleman tell them what the sub-section referred to?

MR. RITCHIE said, that until they progressed with the Bill and absolutely resolved what business should be transferred, it was impossible to say what the sub-section referred to.

MR. CONYBEARE said, that they were asked, in fact, to give the Government a blank cheque. He understood that his Amendment, which came next, the Chairman had ruled out of Order. He presumed that most of the Amendments which stood in his name, followed the ruling on Amendment No. 15, earlier in the evening; but what he wished to ask, as a matter of Order, was whether it was possible to move a distinct addition to the clause, to the effect that powers other than those enumerated in the clause should be vested in the County Council. As a matter of fact, there was no Sub-section (2). What he proposed was that there should be a Sub-section (2). His Amendment was that "the County Council shall also have powers to deal with the following matters, namely," and then followed a list of duties. He submitted that the Amendment could scarcely be ruled out of Order on the ground that the powers enumerated were new powers, that not being powers belonging to the Quarter Sessions they could not be transferred. That might not be the proper place to insert the Amendment; but he submitted that the Amendment was really a substantial Amendment, by which it was proposed to extend the clause by the addition of a fresh sub-section containing further new powers which he desired to see added to the powers of the County Council.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had not in the least limited the power to endow the Council with powers. What he had said was that this Amendment could not be moved upon this clause, as this clause dealt only with the transference of powers.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he did not want to argue the case. He wished it to be perfectly clear that as he read the clause the 1st sub-section referred to the transference of powers, and he desired to add a sub-section giving the County Council additional powers.

MR. FIRTH asked, if it would not be possible to add at the end of the clause words providing that there should also be given to the County Council certain powers enumerated?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; it would be quite inconsistent with the practice.

MR. CONYBEARE: I will move the Amendment later on.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, at end to add the following sub-section:—(xvii.) "There shall also be transferred to the county council all powers now vested in the court of quarter sessions, or any committee of justices, to acquire or provide shire halls, county halls, lunatic asylums, judges' lodgings, assize courts, lock up houses, court houses, justices' rooms, police stations, or other county buildings or works.—(Baron Dimsdale.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, he could assure his hon. Friend that what he desired was fully provided for by Sub-sections 4 and 7 of this clause. The hon. Gentleman was afraid that the powers transferred would not enable the County Council to erect the various buildings which he specified in his Amendment. There could be no question about the fact that the Quarter Sessions had power at present to erect buildings, and it was perfectly clear that the powers of the Quarter Sessions with reference to buildings would be transferred by the clause to the County Council.

BARON DIMSDALE said, that all he wanted to do was to make it clear that the County Council would have the power to provide the buildings required.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he dissented from the interpretation the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) had put on this clause. At the commencement of the discussion on the clause, he called the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the slipshod manner in which the clause was drawn, and further consideration of the clause confirmed him in his opinion. With all respect to the President of the Local Government Board, he ventured to say there was a question as to whether the powers of Quarter Sessions in respect to shire halls and so forth were transferred to the County Councils. Surely it would be better to put the matter beyond all doubt. The right hon. Gentleman said he meant the County Council to have these powers. There was a doubt in the matter, then why reject this Amendment?

MR. RITCHIE said, the right hon. Gentleman drew his attention to the language of the clause a few days ago, and he undertook that, before Report, the language of which he complained should be reconsidered. He agreed that, if necessary, an Amendment should be placed on the Paper dealing with the matter. It seemed to him that having, in the sub-section, dealt with all the questions of buildings, it would be inconvenient to put in another sub-section dealing with similar matters. It was in the first words of the clause that an Amendment was required, if it was required at all, and he had undertaken that the matter should be considered.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. STANSFELD said, that a short time ago the First Lord of the Treasury made a statement with reference to the appointment of Aldermen and the period for which Councillors should be elected.

[Seventh Night.]

He (Mr. Stansfeld) was not in the House at the time the right hon. Gentleman made that statement. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) was present; but he was not sure he had a correct impression of the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. W. H. Smith's) undertaking.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that what he had undertaken with regard to a former clause was, to consider whether the length of the tenure of office of the members of the County Council should be three years or six years, one-third of the number retiring, in the latter case, every two years. He had not, however, undertaken to re-consider the question of the appointment of Aldermen.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER thought there was some slight misapprehension. If he recollected aright, he (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) got up and said it was a part of his proposal that the question of the Aldermen should be reconsidered. The Committee had already decided that there should be Aldermen. Then they negatived the election for six years, and decided that the elections should be triennial. Thereupon, he suggested that they might get rid of the Aldermen, and make the election of Councillors extend over a longer period. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman would not misrepresent any understanding he had ever given. He understood the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider the whole question.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had not the slightest fault to find with the right hon. Gentleman; but he thought it would be in the right hon. Gentleman's recollection that he (Mr. W. H. Smith) distinctly stated that he could not undertake to enter into any engagement to reconsider the question of the appointment of Aldermen.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he did not understand the right hon. Gentleman to enter into any undertaking. It was entirely a matter for reconsideration.

MR. DIXON (Birmingham, Edgbaston) said, he was in the House at the time, and he entirely agreed with the interpretation which had been placed by the First Lord of the Treasury upon the undertaking he had given, and that it did not apply to Aldermen.

Mr. Stansfeld

MR. BRUNNER said, he desired again to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, whether he would not, in some part of the Bill, insert words which would be an encouragement to County Councils to appoint bankers as their treasurers. Bankers did their work as treasurers of Local Authorities extremely well, and they did it without salary. It seemed to him that there were excellent reasons for offering encouragement to County Councils to appoint bankers as their treasurers. The County Treasurer of Cheshire received £400 a-year. To his (Mr. Brunner's) mind, the work would be done very much better by a bank, and without any payment at all. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would give him some assurance he would consider the matter in a favourable spirit; otherwise he would feel bound to frame some words to carry out what he wished.

MR. RITCHIE said, he could assure the hon. Gentleman the Government would give full consideration to any Amendment he might prepare, but the matter he had now raised was not at all germane to the present clause. Personally, he felt reluctant to impose any restrictions in the matter.

MR. BRUNNER said, he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he did not go beyond encouragement.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 4 (Transfer to County Council of certain powers of Justices out of Session).

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) begged to move the amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Hanley (Mr. Woodall).

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 32, after the words "stage plays," to insert the words "elsewhere than within boroughs."—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Ritchie) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, he must ask the Committee not to assent to this Amendment, as the right hon. Gentleman knew boroughs were of all sorts and sizes. All boroughs with over 50,000 inhabitants were to be created counties in themselves for the purposes of the Bill. There were a large number of urban districts which were larger than some boroughs; and it was quite clear that if the Amendment were carried, they would have some right to feel aggrieved. It must be borne in mind that full power was to be given to the County Council to delegate any powers of this kind to the District Councils, and he had no doubt that the County Councils would largely avail themselves of the power where the boroughs were of sufficient importance.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) said, he must suppose the President of the Local Government Board intended the clause as it stood to apply to London. There was a new clause on the Paper which would take the power away, and he desired to understand clearly that that power would not be taken away. He was in favour of the clause as it stood. This was a very serious change in so far as it affected London. It was a change which was wanted, and the representatives of London quite approved of it. The Government had dropped so many things that one would like to know if they proposed to drop this.

MR. RITCHIE said, that by the Bill, as it at present stood, these powers would be conferred on the County Council of London.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) asked if the Government would accept the suggestion that boroughs of a certain size should have these powers. He understood the right hon. Gentleman objected mainly to the power being conferred on small boroughs, say, of 500 or 600 or 700 inhabitants. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] He knew there were some ancient boroughs with fewer than 1,000 inhabitants. Would the President of the Local Government Board consent that boroughs with 5,000 inhabitants at the last Census should have these powers?

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not think they ought to be asked to go further than they had gone in the Bill. The Bill gave to the County Councils full power of delegation, and the Government had every confidence that the Body they were creating would take into consideration all the circumstances of the various districts, and judge for themselves as to the districts which might properly be entrusted with these powers.

MR. STANSFELD asked permission to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said, he could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman should give this power to the County Council if he hoped that they would not use it, but give it to the District Councils. It was a pity not to give the power to the District Councils direct.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

BARON DIMSDALE (Herts, Hitchin) move to insert after the word "plays," in line 32, the words "other than licences for the performance of stage plays by travelling troupes." It was unreasonable to suppose that the County Council, or even a Committee of the Council, should assemble when a troupe coming into a town wanted a licence. Considering the difficulties in the case, it would be as well to reserve the power of granting such licences to the magistrates. The magistrates were always at hand, and could be got together to grant any licence of the kind.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 32, after the word "plays," to insert the words "other than licences for the performance of stage plays by travelling troupes."—(Baron Dimsdale.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, he thought it would be advisable to leave the clause as it stood. His hon. Friend was probably aware that it was usually the buildings in which travelling troupes performed which were licensed, and not the troupes themselves. This was just one of those matters which ought to be dealt with by the County Council. That Body could, of course, delegate the power to the Justices if they liked, or to the District Councils. He felt perfectly certain they could rely on County Councils taking measures to prevent any inconvenience arising in reference to such matters.

MR. BRUNNER begged the right hon. Gentleman to leave this power where it was now—in the hands of the Justices. The right hon. Gentleman thought the County Council would be discreet enough to hand the power to the District Council. Why not leave it where it was? The present system was extremely convenient. The people could go now to the Justices without trouble; whereas if the County Council did not go through the right about face which the right hon. Gentleman expected they would, the people who wanted a licence must go to the county town for it.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Reservation of business to quarter sessions).

On the Motion of Mr. RITCHIE, the following Amendment made:—In page 4, line 36, leave out from “inoculation” to “rate or,” in line 37.

On the Motion of Mr. RITCHIE, the following Amendment made:—In page 4, line 38, after “persons,” to insert “against the basis or standard for the county rate, or.”

MR. ROUND (Essex N.E., Harwich) asked, if the preparation for the basis of the county rate would now be in the hands of the County Council?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): Certainly.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton) said, that as the right hon. Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare) was not present, he begged to move the Amendment which stood in the hon. Gentleman's name—namely, to insert after “All,” in line 40, the word “judicial.” The clause would then read—“All judicial business of the quarter sessions not transferred by this Act,” and so on. He took it that the intention of the Government was that all the business of the Quarter Sessions, except judicial business, was to be transferred to the County Council. If that were the intention of the Government, they had better say so.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 40, after the word “all,” to insert the word “judicial.” — (Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘judicial’ be there inserted.”

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not think it would be well to agree to the Amendment. The insertion of the word would hamper them very materially.

Question put, and negatived.

Mr. Brunner

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) begged to move as an Amendment, to insert after “business,” in line 40, the words “other than judicial business.”

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman is out of Order. Any dealing with judicial business is entirely outside the scope of the Bill; that was ruled to be the case on the question of the Instructions to the Committee.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 2, at the end of the clause, to add the words, “Save as aforesaid all the business of Quarter Sessions shall be transferred to the County Council.”—(Mr. Stansfeld.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG) (Wilts Devizes) said, he was afraid the Government could not accept this Amendment. The point had already been decided, or, at all events, considered in connection with another Amendment.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) said, he failed to see the objection to the Amendment. The words it was proposed to insert were—“Save as aforesaid all the business of Quarter Sessions shall be transferred to the County Council.” The Amendment appeared to him to be entirely consistent with what they had done.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, the insertion of those words might lead to great difficulty. At present the Quarter Sessions did certain business. It was proposed to transfer to the County Councils a certain portion of that business; the rest was to be left to the Quarter Sessions. It would not then be proper to put in general words, such as—“Save as aforesaid all the business of Quarter Session shall be transferred to the County Council.” All business not transferred would remain with the Quarter Sessions. It would lead to great misunderstanding if they added the general words suggested.

MR. ANDERSON said, he entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Attorney General on the point. As he understood the matter, the object of the Bill was to transfer to the County Councils the county business which was not specially dealt with in the Bill. The Amendment was perfectly clear. It was—"Save as aforesaid all the business of Quarter Sessions shall be transferred to the County Council." He thought the hon. and learned Attorney General must have many instances in his mind in which it had been found exceedingly convenient to have general words of this kind. A general provision of the kind very often removed great difficulty, because if they did not have general words like those, they might have litigation as to whether particular powers had been transferred. He could see in the future litigation under the Bill, unless some such words as these were inserted.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, that a few moments ago the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) moved, in the absence of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Camborne Division of Cornwall (Mr. Conybeare) to put in the word "judicial." If that word had been inserted the clause would have read—"All judicial business of the Quarter Sessions not transferred by this Act to the County Council shall be reserved to and transacted by the Quarter Sessions," and then this Proviso would have come in, "save, as aforesaid, all the business of Quarter Sessions shall be transferred to the County Council." The Committee negatived the proposal to insert the word "judicial," and, therefore, the clause stood "all business of the Quarter Sessions not transferred by this Act to the County Council, shall be reserved to and transacted by the Quarter Sessions." It would be quite wrong to put after those words a saving clause, which was only applicable if they had inserted the word "judicial."

MR. ANDERSON said, that in that case he did not understand the ruling of the Chair, that the word "judicial" was outside the scope of the Bill. If that ruling was correct, the point taken by the hon. and learned Attorney General could not arise.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that his ruling was that any attempt to deal with the judicial business of the Quarter Sessions would be outside the scope of the Bill. The insertion of the word "judicial," after all, would not have dealt with that judicial business; it would simply have left the matter where it was.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 116; Noes 165: Majority 49.—(Div. List, No. 162.)

Question, "That Clause 5, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 6 (Powers of quarter sessions as to visiting lunatic asylums).

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to this clause which he would briefly explain to the Committee. The object of the clause was to introduce the magisterial element into the visitation and overlooking of lunatic asylums. Well, the way in which this was provided for in the clause seemed likely to create friction, because it was suggested that the Court of Quarter Sessions should appoint a committee that should have certain powers in the matter so far as visiting and making remarks in the visitors' book, going over the asylums, and so forth; in fact, superintending the work that was entrusted to the County Council. That might—he did not say it would, but it might—lead to friction between the two Bodies—namely, the committee of the county magistrates, and the committee of the County Council. The County Council committee, it must be remembered, would, in all probability, have on it members of the magisterial Body. In all probability that committee would not be composed entirely of Councillors outside the Justices of the Peace, and magistrates would probably be placed on that committee. The magistrates might go on it as elected Councillors, or selected Councillors, and most probably would be represented in one way or the other on these asylum committees of the County Council. Well, it would be unwise to start a new committee in a county drawn largely from the same class as those who already formed the committee for the purpose of watching its operations. He felt strongly, at the same time, that the more lunatic asylums were visited by people of respectability and authority the better, and, therefore, he would extend the power of inspecting them, and he would offer opportunities for as many surprise visits as possible, while avoiding the inconvenience which must arise from a dual control. At present all the Guardians had a right to visit every patient who might be in a lunatic asylum coming from their own Union. Well, it seemed to him (Mr. Stanley Leighton) desirable to leave that power as it stood, and taking that as a precedent that they should give the Justices the power of visiting lunatic asylums in regard to anyone who might be in them from their own Petty Sessional Division. In many cases it would be remembered the magistrates were called upon to sign the certificate before a lunatic was sent to the asylum, and the consequence was that in many cases the magistrates would have already seen the lunatic, and would have signed the order for his committal or reception in the asylum; therefore, it appeared to him, that in order to avoid friction, and at the same time to secure the advantage, so far as possible, of public inspection to persons placed in lunatic asylums, they should accept the principle of the clause while they altered the form of it in the manner he suggested. He did not think the form in which his Amendment stood upon the Paper was quite correct. It required a little alteration, and, if the Government would accept it, he would modify it so that it would run in this way—

“Every Justice of the Peace of any county shall have the same Power of visiting patients from his Petty Sessional Division as Members of Boards of Guardians have at the present time of visiting patients from their own Unions.”

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 3, to leave out the words “The Quarter Sessions,” in order to insert the words “Every Justice of the Peace.”—(Mr. Stanley Leighton.)

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, he was afraid the Government could not accept this Amendment. The hon. Member seemed to think, that if the Justices in Quarter Sessions appointed a Committee for the purpose of visiting these asylums it would lead to friction; but the hon. Member had failed to show why it would lead to friction, and he failed to show that this proposal to enable every magistrate to visit an asylum in the county would lead to less friction. It seemed to him (Mr. Ritchie) that the proposal of the hon. Member would be extremely likely to lead to friction, if every magistrate in a county had a right to enter the lunatic asylums at any time he pleased. He thought the proposal in the Bill was a good one, because it was advisable that a judicial Body like the Quarter Sessions, which was a judicial Body, should have some power of visiting asylums with the view of seeing whether abuses of any kind existed, and if they thought circumstances necessitated it, have the power of recording their opinion as to the state of things there existing. That seemed to him a very desirable power to maintain in the hands of the magistrates, and therefore the Government had provided that it should be so retained, but they certainly thought that it would be very inadvisable to allow every magistrate as an individual, and not as a member of a committee, to visit asylums. The analogy of the Guardians mentioned by the hon. Gentleman was not exactly in point, because it seemed to him that the Boards of Guardians had a locus standi to visit in the asylums those paupers who were supported by the Unions of which they were Guardians. That argument would not apply to magistrates in every part of the county. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Member would not think it necessary to press the Amendment.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said, that the Amendment moved by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Stanley Leighton) was literally a single Motion, but, in reality, it would take a double form. The hon. Member proposed to leave out the words “The Quarter Sessions,” in order to insert the words “Every Justice of the Peace,” so as to enable him later on to move other words to the effect he had explained. He (Mr. Waddy) should like to see the words “The Quarter Sessions” left out, and he would support the hon. Member in that proposal; but those words were not sufficient to leave out. Many hon. Members would agree with him (Mr. Waddy) that it would be desirable to leave out the words “The Quarter Sessions of any county,” in order to insert the words “The County Council,” and then the clause would read—

Mr. Stanley Leighton

"The County Council may from time to time appoint a Committee of their number, not exceeding 10, for the purpose of the visitation of the pauper lunatic asylums of the county ;"

and so on. He (Mr. Waddy) simply desired to indicate what he thought desirable, and did not move these words in any way as an Amendment. He would ask the Chairman his view of the matter as to whether the proper Motion would not be to leave out the words he had referred to instead of merely "The Quarter Sessions," so that he would be in a position to make his proposal if the hon. Member's Amendment were either abandoned or rejected.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member seems to be unaware that Sub-section 7 of Clause 3 is a provision giving County Councils power over the enlargement, management and visitation of asylums for pauper lunatics.

MR. WADDY said, he was aware of that sub-section, but did not know that it would give to the County Council the same powers as they might have under Clause 6.

MR. RITCHIE said, as it was clear these asylums were transferred to the government of the County Council, it would be quite within the powers of the County Council to appoint a committee for the purpose of visiting such institutions.

MR. WADDY said, that if that were so he would submit that nothing could be more absurd, even under the present Government, than to propose that there should be dual control of these asylums. They would have two Bodies to do the same thing. If the two Bodies were not to do the same thing, then, so far as one of them was concerned, the proposal would be a nuisance. If the work to be done under Clause 6 was the same as was proposed to be done under Sub-section 7 of Clause 3 it was an absurdity, and if not they ought to have a clear definition of the work to be done respectively by the one visiting Body and the other.

SIR JOHN DORINGTON (Gloucester, Tewkesbury) said, he rose to support his hon. Friend in this Amendment. The Court of Quarter Sessions in his county held a very strong opinion as to the inexpediency of this particular clause, on the special grounds which had been alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board—namely, that it would prove a great cause of friction in a county. This clause was put in on the analogy to the case of visitation of the county gaols—to enable the Quarter Sessions to appoint a Body for the purpose of visitation. But it should be remembered that the circumstances were different. In the case of the gaols the magistrates were an outside Body who had to inspect what the Government were doing inside, while, in the present case, the circumstances were quite different. He thought the clause was useless in the form in which it stood in the Bill, and he would himself propose, with the full approval of the Justices of his own county and of many other Courts of Quarter Sessions, to omit the whole section. However, pending the putting of the clause as a whole, he approved of the Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. Stanley Leighton). They were about to take a very important step in the administration of their county lunatic asylums. They were going to hand over to a Body, practically a changing one, on which there would, perhaps, be no experts in the management of lunatic asylums, the management of such asylums. This Body would be elected for triennial periods, and on it the welfare and happiness of so many unhappy creatures would depend. Now, supposing the committee of visitors of the County Lunatic Asylums had nothing to do but visit them, not so much would need to be said about the matter, but those were not their functions at all. It was quite a mistake to describe the visiting committee of a county lunatic asylum as a purely visiting committee. It was not a visiting committee at all; the committee were the actual managers of the asylum, and though they were appointed annually by the Court of Quarter Sessions in the month of January, yet he thought that any Court of Quarter Sessions would subject itself to serious censure indeed which ventured to change the Committee of Visitors in January and replace them by an entirely fresh Body. And yet that was what the Bill proposed to do. As to the magistrates themselves, they were to be congratulated upon the fact that they were to be released from the business of managing lunatic asylums. There could be no task more unpleasant, and more distasteful to perform, than that of visiting lunatic asylums. The Visiting Committees had been gradually built up from the large Body of magistrates of the country. They had grown up by slow degrees, and had become familiar with the working of these institutions—in fact, they had become what might be called experts. In his recollection, which went back for a good many years in this matter, he had never known a chairman of the Visiting Committee of his county who would not have been able, if necessary, to go into the asylum and take entire charge of it if anything went wrong. How could the Government hope to establish committees of that kind if the committees were to be appointed triennially? Perhaps he was rather digressing from the particular subject of this Amendment, but he considered this matter so important that it was necessary the Committee should be fully acquainted with the whole nature of the case, and, as a matter of fact, he did not think it had fully appreciated the subject. The visitation of lunatic asylums was undoubtedly one of the most important functions that the Court of Quarter Sessions had to perform, and it would be one of the most important functions that the County Council would have to perform in the future. The House, therefore, was bound seriously to consider the importance of what it was doing by transferring this work from a Body of experts to this which was not an expert Body. Let them take, for instance, the appointment of a medical officer to one of those establishments. From time to time a number of juniors came before the Visiting Committee, who had to discharge the duty of selecting a fit person for the post of medical officer, and unless the committee had a knowledge—

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) said, he desired to ask the Chairman, whether the question the hon. Baronet was dealing with had not really been disposed of under Sub-section 7 of Clause 3?

THE CHAIRMAN: The question of the management of lunatic asylums from the Quarter Sessions to the County Councils has already been disposed of. All that can be discussed here is the question of the appointment of a committee of the Quarter Sessions for the purpose of inspecting the asylums, and even that could not be discussed as a whole, but only in so far as the particular Amendment before the Committee was concerned.

SIR JOHN DORINGTON said, he would not resume the kind of argument he was pursuing as to the importance of the duties that had to be performed by the Visiting Committees. He would merely now say that he entirely concurred with the Amendment which had been proposed, and disagreed with the theory of Clause 6 under which they would be setting up a committee of Quarter Sessions to criticize and inspect the manner in which their successors in the management of the lunatic asylums discharged their functions. He did not think the plan proposed by the clause would work happily at all. He did not think, however, that the interference of the magistrates, which would be involved in the acceptance of this Amendment, in the asylums under the management of the committee would be objectionable, because the magistrates would be limited to visiting patients who had come from their own particular neighbourhood, and whom they would desire to see. Notwithstanding all that had been said against the magistrates in the course of this discussion, the poor naturally turned to the Justices in their own neighbourhood in order to see that things went right. Only that morning he had seen a poor woman who had looked to him as mediator between her and her husband, who was, unfortunately, confined in one of these establishments. He was the frequent means of telling the woman how her husband was getting on. If the magistrates were divorced from this position they would not be conferring a boon upon the poor people of the counties, but on the contrary, would be doing them an injury. He, therefore, supported the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, it seemed to him that a good deal of the speech of the hon. Baronet was really a strong argument in support of this clause. He desired, however, to call attention to a remark made by the hon. and learned Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy), who seemed to have lost sight of the object of these two clauses—Clause 3 and Clause 6. It had already been pointed out that Sub-section 7 of Clause 3 conferred the power of visitation upon the County Councils. It, undoubtedly, gave the County Council power to appoint a committee to discharge certain functions in connection with asylums, but Clause 6 was to give the Quarter Sessions a power to appoint a committee to visit the asylums, and to enter in the visitors' book the result of their inspection as if they were members of the committee of visitors of the asylum. The object of the Amendment was to provide that the magistrates should have power to visit only those persons in the asylums who came from their own districts. The hon. Member (Mr. Stanley Leighton) in the Amendment recognized the desirability of allowing the Justices to visit in certain cases people put under restraint in these asylums. When it was admitted that it was desirable that there should be this class of inspection referred to by the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment, it certainly seemed to him (Sir Richard Webster) that there could be no reason for suddenly saying that the Quarter Sessions should not have the slightest influence or control over, or even power, of inspecting lunatic asylums. The hon. and learned Member for the Brigg Division (Mr. Waddy) had said, that either one Body would do something, and the other do nothing, or that both would do nothing, or that each of them would be a nuisance to the other. He (Sir Richard Webster) failed to see how it could be said that both Bodies would do nothing. They both would have power to visit—and here he would point out that this was only after all an optional clause; it was to provide that "the Quarter Sessions of any county may from time to time appoint a committee of their number," &c. It was considered further a most desirable thing to give the magistrates, who had great experience in matters of lunacy, power to see the functions granted under the Bill properly carried out. He did not see, merely because a new power was to be established, why the magistrates should not be able to see that the lunatics were properly cared for. If it were the fact, as was alleged in some quarters, that they could not transfer the power of managing a lunatic asylum to a worse Body than the County Council, there was all the more reason why they should have a Body of experience to discharge the function of visitation, at any rate, for some time.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, the answer to the remarks and arguments of those who opposed the Amendment was this, that, at any rate, a great number of those magistrates who were such excellent authorities on lunacy matters would be on the County Councils. Surely, the Government had expressed all through, by various arguments and limitations and restrictions and dodges of other kinds, sufficient distrust of the authorities they were constituting under the name of County Councils. They on that (the Opposition) side of the House had been implored by the Government day after day not to show their distrust of these worthy men, men of honour and virtue and respectability—these magistrates who had conducted themselves so well in the past—by suggesting that they could not do this, that they could not do that, and maintained that this power and that that power should be left to them. He thought they had a right now to appeal to the Government to show some confidence in the new authorities they were setting up, the County Councils, and this appeal appeared to him to be all the more reasonable on the present occasion, because, presumably owing to the arrangements they had adopted in the course of this Bill, some at any rate of these magistrates would find places, if not as elected Councillors, at any rate as nominated Aldermen on the County Councils. That being so, nothing would be easier than for those who had this great experience in the treatment of lunatics to be appointed on the committees which the Councils would have the power, according to the Government, of appointing for the visitation of asylums. Surely they rely sufficiently upon the common sense of their countrymen to rest satisfied that the Councils would appoint upon these committees those members who were known as best qualified, by experience and so on, to deal with these asylums. He had sufficient confidence in the Councils to believe that they would not go and form these committees out of the least experienced and most unworthy members of their body, but that they would be careful to select those who had the most experience, and who, under the old system of things, would have had the direct control and visitation of lunatic asylums. Another point which had been urged by the hon. Baronet the Member for Tewkesbury (Sir John Dorington) was, that the elected Council would be a most improper Body to have the control of this matter, of visiting lunatic asylums, because, as he said, that Body would be elected for three years. But there the hon. Baronet was wrong; such was not the scheme of the Government. The scheme of the Government was to have elections only every six years. If he was not misrepresenting the First Lord of the Treasury, according to that right hon. Gentleman's statement there were to be a large number of nominated Aldermen, and, that being the case, it must be evident that the Council would not be a Council consisting of men here to-day and gone to-morrow. They would have Councils who would enjoy their functions for at any rate six years, and would contain a great many men who were nominated Aldermen, and whose positions were thereby assured. He would point to what had been the experience of Town Councils in this matter, when they were told that Members had been returned over and over again by the same constituencies for years and years. The right hon. Gentleman who usually sat with them below the Gangway was returned Mayor for Birmingham for six years, and it was said that he and some members of his family were still on the Birmingham Corporation. [Cries of "Question!"] This was the question, because it was contended by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Dorington) that these new Councils would be transient Bodies.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member's remarks were of a general character, dealing with the clause as a whole. It would be convenient if the hon. Member would confine himself to the special Amendment.

MR. CONYBEARE said, the special Amendment was to leave out the words, "The Quarter Sessions." He was meeting, or endeavouring to meet, arguments from the other side, but did not wish needlessly to trouble the Committee. It would be observed that the next Amendment on the Paper was one which had been already referred to by the hon. and learned Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy)—namely, to insert "County Council" in place of the words "The Quarter Sessions of any county," and he (Mr. Conybeare) should like, with the permission of the Chairman, as it had been referred to, and as it might arise again, to say what would be the best course for him to adopt. He agreed entirely with the hon. Baronet opposite that the best course would be to leave out the clause altogether. It was intended to ask permission to substitute the words "County Council" for the words "The Quarter Sessions in any county," but he (Mr. Conybeare) thought, owing to the discussion which had already taken place, that probably the best course would be for him not to move the Amendment which stood in his name, which was, after the word "county" to insert the words "and the County Council," but when the time came, and the Question to add Clause 6 to the Bill was put, to follow the lead of the hon. Member for the Launceston Division of Cornwall (Mr. C. T. Dyke Acland) and vote against the addition of the clause altogether.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, he should like to say one or two words on what really was a most important question. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board really appreciated how important this question was. The Government had decided to transfer to the County Councils the entire management of the lunatic asylums of the county; but it was now proposed that they should appoint a committee of the Quarter Sessions to visit the asylums whenever they pleased. Now, he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) looked upon it in this light, that if the County Council was a fit and proper Body to have the management of lunatic asylums, they ought to have such management. He would put a parallel case, drawn from the experience of business men in this House, in order to bring the case fairly before the minds of hon. Members. Supposing a Member of this House had deposed a man from the function of managing his property or business, and had put another person in his place, would it be considered a proper thing to appoint the man so deposed to look after the man who had been appointed in his place? He was putting the case as plainly as he could. He did not think there was any use or any necessity for appointing this double committee. As he had said, if the County Councils were to be trusted, it was no business of theirs to look after them. But there was a great deal to be said on the remark the hon. Baronet for the Tewkesbury Division of Gloucester (Sir John Dorington) had made with regard to individual magistrates inspecting those persons who were sent from their own particular Unions, and the certificate of whose detention they themselves might have had to sign. Individual magistrates might with advantage have conferred on them the right of going to the asylums in order to see that such persons received the treatment they deserved. That was a totally different matter altogether, and, therefore, whilst he did not approve of the clause as it stood, he thought there could be no objection to magistrates having the power to go to lunatic asylums in order to see certain individuals, and to ascertain for themselves whether or not they were receiving the sort of treatment they ought to receive.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) said, it was refreshing to the Committee to hear the hon. Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) and he (Mr. Broadhurst) was sure they were all deeply indebted to him for giving them a straightforward opinion from his side of the House as to the value of the County Councils and the concession proposed to be made to the magistrates in this clause. What they had anxiously listened for from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) was some statement as to the necessity for this clause at all. After they had passed Sub-section 7 of Clause 3, Clause 6, which was now occupying the time of the Committee, was not necessary, and he thought the Government would facilitate the progress of Business if they were to at once withdraw it. It was very interesting to hear from hon. Members opposite that they had no faith in County Councils, that they did not believe in elected Bodies, and that they did not think the County Council capable of discharging the duty of the visitation of pauper lunatic asylums. Surely that was an extraordinary opinion; but the Committee knew that it had now got an honest expression of the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite on this matter. He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex that this clause was useless, and he was further of opinion that it was only retained as a sort of sop to the disestablished authorities in the county. To prevent confusion in the administration of an Act, if it ever became an Act, which they were not quite certain of yet, this clause should be removed from the Bill altogether. The Government ought to say what they meant. Let them say boldly that the county magistrates were in future to have no authority in this matter.

MR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.) said, that instead of removing the clause from the Bill altogether, he thought an Amendment could be adopted which would make it a very good provision. He quite agreed with the arguments of the hon. Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that the appointment of a committee of the Court of Quarter Sessions would be really of no advantage whatever. The Court of Quarter Sessions, as they knew, consisted of many dozens of individuals who had the management of these asylums in their hands. If the management was taken out of their hands, he thought that, to give them the appointment of a committee to look after the thing afterwards, would be neither a blessing to them nor to anyone in the asylums. As was well known, lunatic asylums were places where persons were confined away from the eye of the public—where observation did not penetrate—and that, therefore, it was essential to appoint authorities outside to look after and inspect them. Every magistrate should have power to go into a lunatic asylum, and make an examination there of those persons who had been sent in from his own district, and whom he knew. The magistrate had now far more important powers than that. He could sign certificates sending people to these asylums. Why, then, should he not be able to follow them to the asylums, and see that they were properly treated there? He (Mr. Commins) could not see any objection to allowing the magistrate to go to the asylum; he could not see the inability of the magistrate to judge of the manner in which these people were treated. If he was unable to form such judgment, he should not have power to send people to the asylums. As, however, a magistrate was a man who was likely to be interested in lunatics receiving proper treatment, and as, in all probability, by a person who would be acquainted with the friends of the patients, and who had known the patients when sane, for these and for a variety of reasons magistrates who might feel, and justly feel, towards lunatics a certain amount of interest, ought to have power to visit the asylums whenever they thought fit. It would be an advantage, it seemed to him (Mr. Commins), to alter the clause so as to enable magistrates to visit asylums in this way. The privilege would not be thrown away, as magistrates were likely to have a great deal of time on their hands now that they had been disestablished and had had a great many of their present magisterial functions taken from them.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was aware of the resolution come to on this subject by the Middlesex magistrates. Their resolution, in effect, was that the clause which enabled the Quarter Sessions to visit lunatic asylums should be expunged from the Bill, inasmuch as the asylums would be under the jurisdiction of the County Councils, and the Visiting Justices would have no such control. He (Mr. Norris) cordially assented to the Amendment moved by the hon. Member (Mr. Stanley Leighton), because he felt it was good that these asylums should be visited from time to time, and that too strict a watch could not be kept upon them. He did not, however, see the necessity for the nomination of two committees.

MR. RITCHIE said, it would appear from the discussion which had taken place that this Clause 6 had no friends. The Government had inserted it in the Bill because they thought it extremely desirable that the magistrates, who had the power of making orders by which individuals were placed in these asylums, should also have some responsibility attaching to them, by means of visitation, of seeing that the patients were properly cared for, and were not detained any longer than it was right they should be detained. However, it seemed that the clause was not acceptable to the gentlemen who had hitherto performed the duties that they proposed to transfer to the County Councils. The Government, therefore, would not press it unduly upon the Committee. If the Amendment were withdrawn, they would withdraw the clause, and would consider between now and the Report stage whether it was necessary to make any further provision in the direction of this section. Probably it would not be necessary; but the matter should be considered, and, in the meantime, it would be well to withdraw the clause.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, he did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman understood that it was not the Quarter Sessions that sent people to the asylums, but individual magistrates; and, therefore, it was individual magistrates, those who sent people to the lunatic asylums, who, according to the suggestion of the Amendment, were the people who ought to be allowed to visit the asylums in order to look after the patients. He trusted, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would be inclined to consider that point in his Amendment. If the Government were good enough to consider the question, he should have no desire to press the Amendment to a Division. He should be happy to withdraw the Amendment on the undertaking the right hon. Gentleman had given—namely, that the matter would be favourably considered by the Government.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That Clause 6 stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Clause 7 (Powers as to Police).

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire), in moving, in page 5, line 11, to omit the following words:—

"Nothing in this Act shall affect the powers, duties, and liabilities of quarter sessions with respect to the appointment, control, and dismissal of chief constables, and the powers of quarter sessions under section seven of the County and Borough Police Act, 1856, to direct and require constables to perform any duties in addition to their ordinary duties, may be exercised both by quarter sessions and by the county council; but, subject as aforesaid," said, he moved the Amendment for this reason that the Chief Constable was the pivot on which the whole management of the county police turned, and he thought it only natural that the authorities that had the control of the police should also be the authorities to control the Chief Constable. He believed it to be reactionary and mischievous to exclude from the hands of the popular representatives the control of the police. The House had, however, decided that the County Council was not to have the sole control over the police; but he thought that the least that could be done would be to give the Body that did control the police also the control and dismissal of the Chief Constable. Therefore, in order that words might be inserted later on in the clause to give the control of the Chief Constable to the same Body which controlled the police, he begged to move that these words be omitted.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Ritchie) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, the proposal in the Bill was that the appointment of the Chief Constable should remain in the hands of the Quarter Sessions, and that the hon. Member wished to get rid of, his proposal being to transfer that appointment to the joint committees. Well, the proposal of the Government as to the appointment of the Chief Constable had been made in view of the fact that the Quarter Sessions of magistrates in counties were responsible for the peace of the county; and, that being so, they thought it right and proper—that responsibility being cast on their shoulders—that they should also have cast upon them the responsibility of the appointment of the executive officer over the police. He was aware that, so far as the control and administration of the police was concerned, it was proposed to vest it in a joint committee. He knew also that that was a proposal objected to by many Members of the House, who thought that the entire control—not only the appointment of the Chief Constable, but the entire control of the police—should rest with the Quarter Sessions. Well, in his opinion, it was right and proper, having set up a representative Body representing the ratepayers of the county, that that Body should have a share with the Quarter Sessions, who had hitherto had the entire control of the administration of the police, and it was with that view that the Government had proposed this joint committee. But the responsibility for the peace of the county would continue to lie in the Quarter Sessions, and, therefore, they thought it necessary that adequate provision should be made for the proper exercise of that responsibility, and they had considered that if the appointment of the Chief Constable rested in other hands, adequate provision would not be made for the exercise of that responsibility which would be given by the proposal of the Government. Those were the reasons which guided the Government in the proposal they made in the Bill that the appointment of the Chief Constable should be with the Quarter Sessions.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, he thought that in this matter the Government seemed to be going from bad to worse. The control of the police was claimed, on that (the Opposition) side of the House, for the County Council; but now they learned by this clause, and by the attitude of the Government, that the control of the police was given only partly to the County Councils, and that the appointment of the Chief Constable was given wholly to the magistrates in Quarter Sessions. Now, he would venture to say that, under these circumstances, the control which was to be given to the joint committees over the police was a pure pretence. What had the joint committee of the County Council and the magistrates to do in the matter of this control of the police? Why, surely the Chief Constable was the person who would manage and direct and control the police. Whoever had the control of the Chief Constable in their hands would be the party controlling the whole police force. They were face to face with this fact, that the Front Bench on the other side were providing that in the future the control of the police should be exactly what it had been in the past. Arguments such as these were used in respect of the Amendment by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department and some other Members on the other side of the House, who were in favour of the maintenance and control of the police being in the hands, not of the joint Body, but exactly in those hands in which they were at present. Now the Committee saw how that was to be effected. It was to be effected by placing the control of the only person really responsible for the police in the hands of the Quarter Sessions. And so they were to perpetuate in a much stronger form all the evils of the absence of popular control over the police force. He said all the evils of the absence of popular control, but inasmuch as they at present had no Body in whose hands they could place the control of the police, there was an excuse for them; but under the provisions of this Bill they were providing for the establishment of a popularly elected local Governing Body, and by definitely refusing to hand over to that Body the management of the police they were landing themselves in a position which was far worse than they had ever been in before. By giving this popularly elected Body a share in the control of the police and not a share in the control of the Chief Constable, they were creating opportunities for various troubles to arise. He looked forward in London to the effect of this proposal with the deepest distrust and alarm. There was in the past ample ground why in London they should have the police under the control of the Home Office or some other public Department, and why they should have the Chief Constable in London nominated by the Home Office or some other Government Department, because there had been no elected Body to nominate or control him; but though they were to have an elected Council the Government were going to refuse to that Body by this Clause 7—by implication, at any rate, as they were going to refuse it to the rest of the County Councils, though they could raise that point, he was glad to say as to London—the control of the Chief Constable. The Chief Constable ought to re-echo the feelings of the population, he ought to be in sympathy with the views of the people, and ought not to be the representative of what in non-Parliamentary language were called “fads,” as some of the nominated heads of the police were. He would merely point out as to this Amendment, and as to this clause, that the House was now called upon to vote on one of the most important matters in the Bill. It was now about to vote in its most vital form, whether the people or the magistrates were to have the control of the police. He and his hon. Friends were opposed altogether to the admixture of the judicial and administrative functions, and they opposed everything but a popular control over the police being granted by the appointment of the Chief Constable being placed in the hands of the County Council. As they could not now, through what had already been passed in the Bill—at any rate till they got to the Report stage—raise the question again, except in the matter of London, whether or not the County Council was to have absolute control over the police, they contended that if the Government were going to give the joint committee such control, they entirely stultified that committee if they took away from them the power of appointing and controlling the Chief Constable.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, he hoped the Government would forgive him if he expressed some doubt as to the wisdom of their proposal in the particular clause under discussion. This proposal of the Bill had been discussed at great length by the Quarter Sessions of the West Riding in the county of York, and they had passed a resolution to the effect that the appointment of the Chief Constable in counties should rest with the standing joint committee. The discussion on that subject in the West Riding Quarter Sessions had been careful and prolonged, and the opinion arrived at was, if not actually unanimous—which he believed it was—at any rate that of a large majority. He thought that if they placed the appointment of the Chief Constable in the hands of one Body, and the control and management of the police in that of another, they would inevitably have mischief and friction. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board said that the Government held the magistrates responsible for the peace of the county; but it seemed to him (Mr. F. S. Powell) that that was a responsibility which could not be discharged with efficiency or fulness if that Body had the power of appointing the Chief Constable only, and not the power of appointing and controlling those who served under him. He thought that if this responsibility was to be complete, it should be vested in one Body, which should be responsible for the whole organization of the police down to the lowest member of the force. Unless that were done there would be uncertainty and constant friction, and at a critical period in the history of the Council the possibility of anarchy and disturbance. He felt himself some doubt as to whether the Court of Quarter Sessions was the fittest Body upon whom the power of appointment of the Chief Constable could be conferred. The joint committees who were to have the control of the police would be comparatively small in numbers, whereas the Quarter Sessions were composed of large numbers. Now, as they increased the number of a Body who elected an officer, so they diminished the responsibility on the part of each gentleman who voted. Therefore, to place the appointment of the Chief Constable in the hands of the magistrates would be to diminish the prospect of having the best and most satisfactory appointment. Sometimes under the present system, when the appointment of a Chief Constable took place, magistrates appeared on the scene who had not been at the Court of Quarter Sessions for years. He felt great reluctance in being bound to oppose the proposal of the Government, made no doubt with great sincerity and earnestness; but he believed the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board desired Members on all sides of the House to exercise free judgment in criticizing the details of the measure. The observations which he had made were based upon the best consideration which he could give to the subject and the resolution of his Quarter Sessions in the West Riding of the county of York.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) said, he hoped the Government would take into consideration the observations made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell). He (Sir William Harcourt) did not think this was a question which would involve much difference of opinion on either side of the House. The question was what was the best arrangement which could be adopted for the preservation of the peace of a county. Was it probable that the dual form of government which was proposed by Her Majesty's Government would be a good one. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board knew very well that they (the Opposition) had not particularly favoured the appointment of these joint committees; but that matter did not enter into the present question. The joint committee, when it was once formed, was one Body and one government; but in the clause, as it stood, they were not only to have the joint committee consisting of two separate elements, but a totally different Body which was, in most material particulars, to exercise an influence entirely independent of the joint committee. In the old days, in time of war, it was not a very good thing to have a council in conflict with the commander of an army, and, generally speaking, operations of war were not well conducted under such circumstances. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider, assuming that the magistrates were to appoint a Chief Constable who was distasteful to the majority of the County Council, how the system would be likely to work. There would be a Chief Constable appointed who would be distasteful to the general body of the police. Supposing that the Chief Constable demanded a certain number of men, and the County Council were adverse to that Chief Constable, it was quite plain they might refuse the men, they might be at constant war with the Chief Constable at the head of the police, and the police would be perfectly well aware that they were serving two masters who were in conflict one with the other. Was that likely to work well in the government of the police? He could not think it was. What was the reason they were to distrust the County Council and the joint committee they proposed to set up? They did not distrust similarly appointed Bodies in communities quite as liable to disturbance as any they could find in counties. Take great towns like Liverpool or Glasgow; they allowed the Watch Committee there to appoint the Chief Constable, and they took the municipal government of such places as their model for legislation, and they adhered to it on the whole very closely and very faithfully. What would Liverpool or Glasgow say if Parliament were to declare that the magistrates should appoint the Chief Constable and the Watch Committee should administer the police? Would such towns have stood it for a single moment? Was the peace not safe in the hands of the Watch

[Seventh Night.]

Committee? Why, then, were they to distrust the joint committee and the County Council which the Bill established? There was no doubt that the Justices were the conservators of the peace in counties; but so they were in boroughs, and if any disturbance arose the Justices had the right now to give orders to the police. In every borough in the country the Justices were the conservators of the peace; but it was not necessary on that account that they should have the appointment of the Chief Constable, and it seemed to him that if the Government would only adhere to the example they had taken as the model and framework of their Bill, they would do much more wisely than to set up this dual form of government, which was almost certain to lead to conflict between the two Bodies. If they could trust the County Council at all, let them trust it to this extent; if they did not trust it, let them not trust it under any circumstances. He earnestly hoped the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) would listen to the advice which had been tendered to him by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell), who had just spoken, backed, as it was, by a very important opinion, the opinion of the Quarter Sessions in the West Riding of Yorkshire. He (Sir William Harcourt) did not know any Body which was capable of forming a sounder opinion on such a subject than the Quarter Sessions of the West Riding of Yorkshire; and if they were not jealous of this power, if they were willing to concede it, if they considered it was to the advantage of the organization of the police and of the administration of the police that this course should be taken, he could not see why the Government should be afraid in this matter to trust the joint committee who were to have the joint control of the police, the pay of the police, the determination of the numbers of the police, and, in fact, the general management of the police, and to place in their hands the nomination of the Chief Constable. As far as he could see, nothing but mischief would arise out of the arrangement proposed, and he hoped the Government would see fit to agree to the present Amendment.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said, that the right hon. Gentleman

(Sir William Harcourt), as he understood him, objected to the proposals of the Government because, while on the one hand the appointment of the Chief Constable was to be left in the hands of the Quarter Sessions, the control of the police and the management of the police was to be of a dual character. He was bound to say there was great force in the objections which the right hon. Gentleman raised; but he (Mr. Chaplin) adduced from his objections conclusions exactly opposite to those drawn by the right hon. Gentleman. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to desire that the appointment and control of the Chief Constable as well as the control of the police should be of the dual character which was contemplated by the Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood him. He did not raise the question of the dual position of the joint committee; he regarded that as a single Body and a single control, though he might have preferred a difference in the composition of it.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he quite understood the right hon. Gentleman's desire that the control of the Chief Constable and of the police should be in the hands of the Body which was contemplated by the Government, whether that be a dual Body, as he (Mr. Chaplin) thought, or a single Body, as the right hon. Gentleman considered it to be. He thought there was great objection to that proposal, and he adduced, as he said just now, conclusions exactly opposite to those of the right hon. Gentleman. What they ought to do in regard to this Amendment was to oppose it, so that when the proper time came for the discussion of the question, those Gentlemen who thought it right to do so could vote in favour of the whole control of the police, both of the Chief Constable and of the police force generally, being left in the hands in which it was at present.

MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin) did not seem to appreciate the effect of the Amendment. There was to be a dual control. The first point of his hon. Friend (Mr. T. E. Ellis) was that under the Bill the appointment of the Chief Constable was to be left to the Quarter Sessions entirely, and that, after the appointment of the Chief Constable had been so left, there was to be a perfect dual control; that the County Council and the Quarter Sessions were to have power over the direction and the requisition of constables to perform any particular duties in addition to or outside their ordinary duties. The Amendment proposed that there should not be reserved to Quarter Sessions the appointment of the head of the Police Force, and that there should not be left to the Quarter Sessions, as one independent Body, and that there should not be conferred upon the County Council, as another independent Body, power to direct the police constables to perform certain duties. The result of there being two independent Authorities would be what the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) stated—namely, that there must be conflict between the two Bodies, the County Council and the Quarter Sessions in giving directions to policemen. As had been said from the opposite side, it did seem absurd that those who had to direct the actions of the privates in the Police Force were not to be persons who were to have the selection and appointment of the head who was to control the force.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said, he did not altogether agree with the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend who had just spoken (Mr. Warmington), and he must say that it appeared to him that the observations which were made a moment ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) were strictly logical and perfectly fair. The right hon. Gentleman took a perfectly intelligible and consistent view; he considered that the management of the police should be left entirely in the hands of the magistrates, and there was a great deal to be said in favour of such a view. But he (Mr. Waddy) and his hon. Friends took a view exactly the opposite; but it did appear to him that the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, however much they might disagree with them, were perfectly fair and logical. What he (Mr. Waddy) desired to point out was that they had already agreed that in some form they must have dual control. They had given to the County Council the duty of raising the money for the payment of the police—they had given to the County Council the power of the purse, in the 1st sub-section of Clause 3; and having done that, they were now about to say that the duty of raising the money for the police should be the duty of one Body, and that the patronage should be the share of another Body. He did not, for one moment, agree with some observations made, to the effect that they were simply going to give the power of appointing the Chief Constable to the magistrates, and the power of appointing the subordinate constables to the County Council. He did not think it for one moment, because, in point of practice, every one knew perfectly well that the constables would be appointed by the Chief Constable. The Chief Constable would receive their names, he would judge of their qualifications, he would make such recommendations as were necessary, and in 99 cases out of every 100, even if the Committee gave nominally the appointment to the County Council, really the nominations would rest with the Chief Constable, who was the nominee in reality of the magistrates. That was one result of pretending that this was a Liberal Bill, when in reality they were not giving in substance that which they were giving in form. One difficulty which would meet the Committee at every turn would be that the Government were trying to take back with one hand that which they were pretending to give with the other. They were in reality about to throw on the County Council the liability of providing for the police, while they were giving the patronage of the police to someone else. They were raising a dual control of the very worst form with regard to that matter as to which, of all others, County Councils would be the most sensitive and the most anxious. If County Councils were not fit to take care of the police, the Government had better tear up this Bill altogether. If they could not trust them with power, let them say so at once. If they wanted to have a kind of imperium imperis, if they wanted to have set over the County Councils some Body which was to keep the County Council in order, and govern them in regard to these matters which were too good for the County Council to take care of, and too aristocratic to be placed in the hands of the County Council, let them say so at once. It was a pity the Government had not raised this point in the way the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin) had raised it; why should they not say at once—"We think that the whole of this matter should be left to the magistrates"? ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Bench.] Quite right, that was an honest way of dealing with it, and he was glad to hear the cheers. Let them go to the country when the right time came with this distinct issue. He quite agreed that that was fair fighting, that that was exactly the kind of thing one wanted, and which one did not always get. Nothing whatever would be more satisfactory to the Opposition than to have this issue raised clearly and completely—namely, that County Councils were not to have the control of the police. Whatever the Government did, he begged them not to pretend they were giving to the County Councils that which they were not—to pretend that they were giving to the County Council power when, at the same time, they were withholding from the County Council a power which gave them the grasp of the whole position.

MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe) said, he thought his hon. Friend who moved this Amendment (Mr. T. E. Ellis) would have done better if he had divided it into two, and if it was still possible for the hon. Gentleman to do so he suggested he should take that course, and that the Amendment should stop at the word "constables" in the third line of the clause. [An hon. MEMBER: He has stopped there.] He (Mr. M'Laren) was glad that had been done; because, as the clause stood, so far from there being dual control of the police there were no less than three separate Bodies which were to control the police. He believed there was nothing that was felt more strongly in the country, and in the county districts which were now to have County Councils, than the question of the appointment of the Chief Constable. Those who were likely to be members of the County Councils resented very strongly that they were not to have the complete control of the police in their hands. They, perhaps, might be willing, as a matter of compromise, that a joint committee should be appointed as the clause provided for the control of the police; but with regard to the appointment of the Chief Constable they felt most strongly that, if the joint committee was not to have the appointment of that official, then the control of the police was very largely a sham, and that that portion of the joint committee which was composed of members of the County Council would really have nothing but a nominal interest in the matter, and the other section of the joint committee, that section which was appointed by the Quarter Sessions, would really have the practical control of the police. There did not seem to be any real reason why this joint committee should not have the appointment of the Chief Constable. Half of the joint committee, the permanent element, would represent the Quarter Sessions. It was not as if the whole matter was to be transferred to the County Councils, a Body of which there had been no experience as yet; but half of the joint committee was to consist of the very gentlemen who for years past had had the management of the police, and whose greater experience, stability, and permanency upon the joint committee would ensure to them a very large, and probably preponderating, weight in the appointment of the Chief Constable and in the general control of the police force. Therefore, considering the experience they would bring to bear upon the joint committee, as distinct from the comparative newness of the men who were elected, he thought they might with perfect safety agree to the Amendment of his hon. Friend. It was certain that the proposal of the Government could not be a final settlement; the question would be agitated by the County Councils, for the County Councils would not be content to leave the appointment of the Chief Constable, which really meant the control of the police, in any hands but their own.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) said, the difficulty there was in respect to this clause arose from the word "control." If the Quarter Sessions were to continue to control the Chief Constable, they must, he apprehended, also control the police. Supposing the Chief Constable determined to issue a proclamation, and the Quarter Sessions supported him in it, excluding the inhabitants of the county from some part of the county, and the County Council insisted that the people should have access to that part, would the Chief Constable be able to use the constables against the will of the County Council? If so, this proposition was most absurd.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CLARKE) (Plymouth) asked to be permitted to say a word or two in reference to the observations which had just fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Firth). His hon. and learned Friend suggested that the Chief Constable appointed by the Quarter Sessions might issue a proclamation prohibiting the people going into a particular part of a district. The hon. and learned Gentleman knew perfectly well that no Chief Constable had power to issue any such proclamation. It was quite a commonplace of law that no proclamation issued by a Chief Constable had any effect as a proclamation in making that illegal which would be otherwise legal. That question had never been disputed. One or two observations had been made in regard to this clause, and one or two speakers had wandered off and had denounced the Government for pretending to give that with one hand which they took away with the other. He ventured to say that there was no ground for that statement in regard to this clause, but that it really was one which should be dealt with in the method adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), who discussed this reasonably, as a somewhat difficult question for which a solution had to be found. One difficulty of the question had been indicated by a speech which was made in favour of the appointment of the Chief Constable being left to the elected Body, and it was said a person should be elected who was in sympathy with the feelings of the elected Body. He submitted that the question of the Chief Constable being in sympathy with the feelings of the elected Body had nothing to do with the discharge of his duties. In regard to the administration of the duties connected with the Criminal Law, it was the duty of the Chief Constable to use his best endeavours to put the Criminal Law in force, without regard to any question of what opinion any elected body might have regarding it. But in regard to the mere administrative part of the work of the police, that administrative part of the work would be controlled by the joint committee, which was contemplated in the second part of the clause.

It had been said that the Justices had the control to a certain extent, and, according to well defined limits, of all constables who were engaged in the administration of the Criminal Law; but the Quarter Sessions had now, and would have when this Bill was passed, the special duty of watching over the administration of the Criminal Law, and surely it was advisable that the Court of Quarter Sessions should have the power of controlling that officer, who would have to direct the duty and services of the police at large, in the administration of those practically judicial powers, the administration of the criminal law, which must belong to the Quarter Sessions, which is judicial, and not to the elected Body, which is administrative. It had been said that the Chief Constable might say he wanted a certain number of men, and that the elected Body might refuse to give them to him. That was quite possible, though he thought that elected Councils would not be very likely to refuse a responsible officer the services of sufficient numbers to execute the duties which were cast upon him; but, if that were so, the Chief Constable would have the duty of carrying out the administration of the Criminal Law with such means as were given to him. He (Sir Edward Clarke) submitted to the Committee that really the principal part of the duty of the police—that was to say, that part which was connected with the enforcement and administration of the law—would still be done under the control and direction of the Quarter Sessions, and, therefore, it was reasonable that the Quarter Sessions should have that security for the proper administration of law within the area for which it was responsible, which it would obtain by having the nomination and control of the Chief Constable.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said, he desired to ask hon. Gentlemen opposite, who had had great experience in serving on Police Committees, as well as Gentlemen sitting upon the Opposition Benches, who were familiar with the working of Watch Committees—he wished to ask them, apart from all Party considerations, in regard to this question, how this clause would really work? How was it possible to administer the police force in the way which this clause pointed out? He could quite understand the views and policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin); they were perfectly intelligible, they were justified by precedent, and he believed they would work admirably well in practice. The right hon. Gentleman would put the police under the complete control of one Body—namely, the Quarter Sessions, who had had that control previously, and there was no reason to believe that there would be any conflict in the work. He could quite understand the adoption of the principle advocated on the Opposition side of the House—namely, placing the police under Watch Committees appointed by the Councils. That also would work, and he believed it had worked, satisfactorily in towns. Now, let them see what the proposals of the Government amounted to, and how they would work. They had, first, one Body, which was to levy the police rate, which was to find the money, which was to be responsible for the financial departments of the police; and they had, secondly, another Body, which was to be composed partly of the elected Body and partly of the Justices, who were to have, to a certain extent, the control over the police, which at present was exercised by the Quarter Sessions. But that Body so constituted, novel in its conception, novel in its constitution, was nevertheless to find itself crippled in the exercise of its powers by being put in the position of having the Chief Constable absolutely independent of it. What control could the joint committee have over the police if the Chief Constable was able to set them at defiance, and to appeal to some other Body behind their backs? He put it to hon. Gentlemen who had any experience of work of the kind, whether such a system would work, whether a Chief Constable, who was like many other public officers, could be kept, he would not say, in a state of subordination, but in the state of discipline in which he ought as well as all other public servants to be, if one Body was to control the police force and another Body was to control the Chief Constable? Would they apply such a theory in the Army and Navy; could they point out any precedent in any department of English public life for such a one-sided, useless, and futile mode of controlling the police force. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board said they should put the control of the police constable where the responsibility of the maintaining the peace lay; but that was just what they did not do in the case of the large towns. There the control of the Chief Constable and the responsibility of the peace had been permanently severed, and the right hon. Gentleman had no illustration to give that that severance had been productive of evil results. The hon. and learned Solicitor General was quite right when he said that the magistrates were responsible for the preservation of the peace. Let him (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) give an illustration which came to his own knowledge. When he had the honour of being the Mayor of the town which he now represented, a disturbance of the peace was apprehended, so great a disturbance that application was made to the Home Secretary to direct the commander of the Northern District to send a troop of soldiers into Wolverhampton. The magistrates met; the Town Council or the Watch Committee had nothing to do with the preservation of the peace. At that critical moment, the whole control of the police and of the Chief Constable was in the hands of the Mayor and the magistrates. They sat there during the greater part of the night, and they were responsible for preventing, and happily they did prevent, any outbreak. But there was no conflict, no difficulty in the management, either of the police or of the Chief Constable, although the Chief Constable was appointed by the elected Body and paid by the elected Body. The Committee had decided that this was to be handed over to the joint committee. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, it had decided it was not to be put in the hands of the County Council. He presumed the Government were going to stand to their proposal with reference to the joint committee; he presumed there would be no wobbling in that respect. He assumed that if the Government did stand firm, there could be no question that with the support they would receive from the Opposition side, the proposal for a joint committee would be carried. If the joint committee were appointed, and the Chief Constable placed in an absolutely independent position, there would certainly be a great deal of friction. After all, the appointment of the Chief Constable was a question of patronage. The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell), who spoke with authority as representing the unanimous opinion of the largest and most influential body of magistrates in England, in objecting to this clause alluded to the large number of gentlemen who gathered together in Town Councils on the question of the election of a Chief Constable. He (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) did not think that the appointment of such an officer by a contested election was the best mode of selection. He thought that a small committee was the very best Body by whom such an official could be appointed. One of the powers it would exercise with the greatest efficiency and satisfaction would be the choosing of a Chief Constable without all the unpleasantness of a popular election. He attached far more importance to the control and the dismissal of the Chief Constable than to the appointment. If they were to have a Chief Constable in thorough sympathy with the Council they must have that authority at one with itself. He asked the Committee to support the Amendment.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) hoped the Government would re-consider their decision on this point. Their proposal for the appointment of the Chief Constable was quite inconsistent with the proposal for a joint committee, and was, indeed, destructive of the system. If the Chief Constable were to be appointed by the Justices alone, he would be put in a difficult position with regard to the joint committee, half of which would be Justices and half not, and he would probably regard the Justices on that committee with very different eyes to those with which he looked at the other members. In giving the joint committee nominal control of the police, and in giving Quarter Sessions the real appointment and control of the Chief Constable, they were giving but a shadow to the joint committee and reserving the substance for Quarter Sessions. He therefore appealed to the Government, if they wished to carry out their proposal—which was defensible and perfectly legitimate—for a joint committee, to surrender on this point.

CAPTAIN COTTON (Cheshire, Wirral) said, he intended to support the Government in their proposal for a joint committee, but he hoped the Government would see their way to lumping the whole police body, including the Chief Constable, under the joint committee.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead) said, he failed to reconcile the decision at which the Government had arrived on this point with some of the declarations made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board at an earlier stage of that Bill. Unless his (Mr. James's) memory failed him, the right hon. Gentleman then insisted in more than one of his speeches, that he trusted the people—indeed he gave expression to that sentiment at least half-a-dozen times. But now he came to the question of trusting the people in a practical manner he stepped aside. Having presided for a good many years in a southern rural constituency, he (Mr. James) had had opportunities of watching the operations of a Police Committee, and he had himself been a member of such a committee in Quarter Sessions. The fault he found with the system was one to which there could be little objection. It appeared to him that the police had really not enough to do. In many cases their numbers might be considerably reduced, and without wishing to be offensive to hon. Gentlemen opposite, he would point out that the police in the country often acted during the winter as assistant game keepers, and in the summer amused themselves in disporting at cricket matches. Now, if the numbers of the police were to be diminished, and the patronage of the Chief Constable also diminished, there would be friction at once between the Joint Authority—the County Council and the magistrates—and it would make confusion worse confounded. If hon. Members opposite really trusted the people, he wished they would bring themselves to believe that the people were just as much interested in the maintenance of law and order as they themselves were. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) in the early part of the evening said the County Councils would have very little to do. Well, he (Mr. James) was very much disposed to agree with him, and if they carried the clause in its present form and had a divided jurisdiction, he believed that not only would the County Council have very little to do, but they would always be quarrelling amongst themselves like cats and dogs.

MR. KENRICK (Birmingham, N.) said, he wished to point out, as Chairman of the Watch Committee in a great borough, that the control over the Chief Constable meant there, practically, the modelling and control of the police force. The force was exactly what the Chief Constable made it, in the same way that a school was what the headmaster made it. To give, then, the appointment of the Chief Constable to a Body other than that responsible for the force, would be to cause a great deal of friction. In Birmingham, the appointment and control of the Chief Constable meant really the control of the police force. As the Government had set up a joint and efficient committee he hoped they would give them real powers.

MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon) said, he had served as Chairman of a Police Committee for nearly 20 years, and its action had simply been to advise the Chief Constable in matters relating to the administration and allocation of the force. Practically, the Chief Constable of a county filled the position of Colonel of a regiment, and he hoped that that would remain so. In all money matters, and on points as to the disposition of the force and the building of new police stations, he consulted with the Police Committee. That was especially so in his (Mr. Wharton's) own county, where they had a very large, dense, and shifting population. Men had frequently to be transferred from one portion of the county to another, and new police stations built. There seemed to be an idea amongst some Members of the Committee that the Police Committee had actual control over the police itself. That, however, was not the case in counties. There the control of the police force was in the hands of the Chief Constable. Hon. Members representing boroughs seemed to think the Chief Constable of the county and Head Constable of the borough held exactly the same kind of position. But that was not so; they were essentially different. In the borough, the Head Constable was under the command and control of the Watch Committee; in the county, the Chief Constable was, by Act of Parliament, the Watch Committee, and he was only advised by the Police Committee on matters relating to the administration and disposition of the force. Now, he would have been well satisfied if the Government had seen fit in their Bill to leave to the county magistrates the control of the police which they already possessed. He had listened with great respect—as he always did—to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who spoke with reference to what might happen in regard to trade organizations, and with respect to large gatherings of working men—say, in the North. Now, he did not want to rake up the past; but he remembered that on one occasion he saw the whole of a county in the hands of a miners' organization, and for one day the Miners' Union was fighting tooth and nail with the police. Six police stations were absolutely wrecked; 100 men were bleeding on that occasion, and one man was killed. The Durham police constituted as fine a force as ever existed, and they were looking to this House with great apprehension lest they should be transferred to other control. They were entitled to consideration. This ought not to be made a Party question, and he hoped the House would do its best, in the interests of the observance of the peace, to keep Party considerations out of it. Let the Committee consider well what they were about. Were they willing to transfer the police from the present administration to some new Body, as to whose future existence and success they knew nothing?

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon) said, he quite agreed that that was not a Party question. What they wanted to do was to ensure the best chances for selecting the best Chief Constable to manage the police. They all agreed that Quarter Sessions had shown great ability in the management of affairs; but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill whether it was not a fact that the appointment of Chief Constables had been in the past the weak part of the management? Frequently, the appointment had been made practically by men who had taken no part whatever in the management of the county business; and he would ask, was not a good selection more likely to be made by a small committee than by the Court of Quarter Sessions? In the past, it had been a question rather of personal influence than of selection; a large number of magistrates never took any part in the county business except when these appointments were to be filled, and the ruling power in making them was personal consideration.

MR. W. BECKETT (Notts, Bassetlaw) said, he differed from the Government on this question, as he was not in favour of the appointment of the Chief Constable remaining in the hands of the Court of Quarter Sessions. He would tell the Committee what his experience had been. Some few years since the appointment of Chief Constable was vacant in the West Riding of Yorkshire, with which he was connected, and it was a matter of notoriety that, some weeks before it was filled up, candidates made it their business to go round to every member of Quarter Sessions. The result was that some gentlemen were weak-minded enough to promise their votes beforehand. Some, of course, were sufficiently strong-minded not to do so. Well, the gentleman who was eventually chosen was selected mainly because he was blessed with 13 children. He had no intention of casting any reflection on the gentleman appointed. Comparisons were odious; but he wished to point out the extreme inconvenience and great demoralization arising from such a mode of election. Therefore, he was not in favour of the appointment remaining in the hands of Quarter Sessions. Neither did he much care about its being in the hands of the joint committee; but he should infinitely prefer it to be vested in the Home Secretary, as, if that were the case, they would have a much better chance of getting good men appointed without regard to their domestic circumstances. A variety of county appointments were made by the Home Secretary and the Lord Chancellor. As the less of two evils, he did not object to the appointment being made by a joint committee of the County Councils and the Magistrates, though he should prefer to place the duty on the Home Secretary; but nothing could be more objectionable than the present system of appointment by 200 to 300 magistrates. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax that there could be no objection to allowing the County Councils to fix the salary of the Chief Constable.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire N.E., Darwen) said, he could not approve the proposal to vest these appointments in the Home Secretary, and he sincerely hoped the Committee would weigh well the words which had fallen from the lips of his hon. Friend the Member for the Ripon Division of Yorkshire (Mr. Wharton), who implied that the control of the Chief Constable meant really the control of the police. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. W. Beckett) referred to what he considered to be a gross abuse in the case of a particular appointment. No doubt, such things did occur; but he would venture to remind the Committee that the clause provided for the appointment, control, and dismissal of the Chief Constable, and that, even if a mistake were made in the appointment, great harm was not necessarily done. What, however, would constitute a great evil would be if the Chief Constable did not consider himself secure in carrying out the duties laid upon him, as he would feel if he were liable to dismissal for doing what he believed to be his duty. It was just that danger which some of them feared might happen if the Chief Constable were under the control of and subject to dismissal by an elective Body. He hoped that hon. Members would fully realize what they were doing in voting for this particular Amendment, which referred to the question of the appointment of the Chief Constable. They were not dealing with the question of dual control; that point was entirely separate. He believed every Member of the Committee would feel the importance of leaving the appointment of the Chief Constable in the hands of the Court of Quarter Sessions, and he fully agreed with the views of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Ripon Division that the control of that appointment meant the real control of the force. He should, therefore, vote for the proposal of the Government.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I should like to point out that the hon. Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. E. Ellis) moved to leave out certain words down to "aforesaid" in line 17. But, there being several other Amendments, I propose to put the words "nothing in that Act" shall stand part of the Clause. If I did not do that, the subsequent Amendments would be shut out.

MR. JAMES STUART said, the question really, then, was not the simple one put by the noble Viscount, but it was complicated by the question of dual control. Perhaps it would be better for his hon. Friend the Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. E. Ellis), with the permission of the Committee, to withdraw his Amendment, in order to facilitate a vote being taken on the more important question.

MR. T. E. ELLIS: I moved to omit the words from "nothing" to "Chief Constable," in line 13.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I understood the hon. Member to move the Amendment on the Paper. If he withdraws that I will put the other.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said, he was afraid that Amendment would bar his Amendment.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said, that if the Amendment to omit the words down to "Chief Constable" were put, it would prevent the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) being discussed.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member moved, and so I stated, to leave out the words from "nothing" to "afore-said;" but I only propose to put it down to "Chief Constable," so as to enable the other Amendments to be discussed.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): It might be a greater convenience to the Committee if the Amendment which stands in my name were now discussed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 11, to leave out the words "nothing in this Act," &c., down to "the appointment of the Chief Constable."

MR. ASQUITH (Fife, E.) said, the question really involved in the Amendment was the dual control of the police, and he ventured to submit to the Committee that it was impossible to discuss the proposal reserving to the Court of Quarter Sessions the power of appointing, controlling, and dismissing the Chief Constable, without considering what was necessarily involved in it—namely, the whole question of the control and management of the police force. The Government proposal, as it stood, involved an extraordinary anomaly. It proposed that for the future the police should be paid by one Body, officered by another Body, and controlled by a third Body. When they came to examine it, he thought that the Committee would discover that the proposal of the Government was of a much simpler character. It really was that the police should be paid by an elective Body representing ratepayers, but that the whole control and management of the police should be vested in the magistrates sitting in Quarter Sessions. He was very glad to hear from the hon. Member for the Ripon Division of Yorkshire (Mr. Whar-ton), who spoke on that matter with the authority of great experience, such a candid and accurate statement of the real facts. He would like to call the attention of the Committee to the material parts of the Act of 1839, which regulated these matters, and which, even if this Bill were passed, would continue to regulate them. That Act, after providing that the Chief Constable should be appointed by the Justices in Quarter Sessions, laid it down that the Chief Constable should appoint other constables, and at his pleasure should dismiss all or any of them, and that he should have the general disposition and management of all constables so appointed, subject to such lawful orders as he might receive from the Justices generally in Quarter Sessions assembled. Very well. Hon. Gentlemen opposite need not be so apprehensive about the dual control given by the Bill, because, after all, the dual control was a mere sham, and nothing but a sham, seeing that the Government reserved to Quarter Sessions the powers they already possessed, and the Chief Constable would be enabled in the future to act as he now did, subject to the orders of the magistrates. It was most important that the Committee and the country should understand the real character of the proposal under consideration; and when they supported the Amendment of his hon. Friend to omit that part of the clause, they were really deciding the question which was at the root of the whole matter, and they were determining in whose hands the control and management of the police should be for all time to come. Something had been said—he believed by his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General—as to the importance and value of the police being subject to judicial authority. A certain amount of confusion of thought appeared to prevail on this matter. The management of the police by Quarter Sessions under the existing Acts was a thoroughly administrative function, and had nothing whatever to do with judicial authority. If the management of the police were transferred to the elected Councils, as they asked the Government to transfer it, the magistrates in Quarter Sessions, or rather the magistrates individually, would have precisely the same power as the Common Law gave them to call on any police constable in the county to execute the law and maintain order throughout the district. It was, therefore, wholly beside the mark to draw, as the hon. and learned Member for Ripon (Mr. Wharton) did, on historical reminiscences as to disorders that existed in the county of Durham at one time. The fact was that in the future, as now, the Justices would be able to call on the police to assist them in the execution of the law, and all the Government were asked as to these elective Bodies was that as they had conceded to them the duty of providing the funds out of which the force was to be paid, so they should give them the administrative and executive powers which at present were vested in Quarter Sessions, and which had nothing whatever to do with judicial functions. He, therefore, hoped the Committee would support the Amendment of his hon. Friend, and remove this patent blot from the Bill.

MR. E. B. HOARE (Hampstead) said, he could not hope that the Government would attend to any words that might fall from him; but he could not help thinking that the position they were now in was very anomalous. There were three courses open to the Government. They could either hand over the police to the magistrates—as many persons on that (the Ministerial) side of the House thought they should—or hand them over to the County Councils—as hon. Gentlemen on the other side thought they should—or they could hand them over to joint committees, which was what they themselves wished to do. It did seem to him that if the Government were right in their proposal to hand the police over to a joint committee, they should also hand over to that committee the control of the Chief Constable. If the Army were handed over, so, also, should the command of it be handed over. He spoke with some diffidence on the matter; but he felt that the position of the Government was so illogical that he could not help hoping that even now, at the eleventh hour, they would accede to the Amendment.

MR. NORTON (Kent, Tunbridge) said, he thought the question should be allowed to stand over until the Committee had decided whether the control of the police should be placed in the hands of the county magistrates or in those of a joint committee.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale) said, it seemed to him that there was a great deal in what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down to recommend it to the Committee. They had not yet decided whether any powers of control over the police were to be vested in a joint committee, and until that point had been decided he scarcely saw how they could decide on the matter now under discussion. He did not know how it could be done; but it certainly seemed to him desirable that the Committee should come to some decision as to the constitution of the joint committee to whom they were to refer certain powers for the management of the police. If the committee were properly constituted to control the police, it seemed to him only logical that the appointment of the Chief Constable should be placed in their hands. But until they had decided on the appointment of a joint committee, it certainly appeared rather difficult to decide the point they were now discussing.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the proper course would be to omit these words for the present. That would meet the views, certainly, of the majority of the House, because if the House were to decide against a joint committee, then the police would remain under the Quarter Sessions, and they would have the appointment of the Chief Constable, and the words under discussion would not be wanted at all. If the Committee, on the other hand, should determine in favour of the joint committee, that committee would have the control both of the police and the Chief Constable. Whatever view they took of the matter, and whatever the view of the Committee might be, the question in debate would be settled by that decision. All, therefore, they had to do now was to omit these particular words, and then take the decision of the Committee on the question of the joint committee. The other matter would follow as a matter of course.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he agreed with what had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale. He had thought for some time that they were putting the cart before the horse in the discussion they were engaged in. But he did not quite follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby in his suggestion as to the way in which they ought to proceed. It seemed to him (Mr. Chaplin) that the best way for them to arrive at a decision as to whether or not the police were to be left in the hands of a joint committee would be for the Amendment to be withdrawn, and for a decision to be taken on the proposal of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). If that were settled in favour of the Amendment, then, in the next line of the clause, the question would follow as to whether or not the Chief Constables were to be dealt with in the same way. If this suggestion should find favour with the Committee, it certainly seemed to him a practical way of dealing with the subject.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he was afraid that the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman was hardly one which, according to the Rules of the Committee, they could adopt. It would not be possible to go back on the words already passed. He thought, however, that the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for the Tunbridge Division of Kent (Mr. Norton) and his noble Friend opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) was one they ought to adopt, without in the slightest degree prejudicing the question before them. They should allow these words to go out for the present, and then, at once, proceed to the consideration of the more important question as to whether the control of the police was to be in the hands of the magistrates, or to be put in the hands of a joint committee. When that question was decided, it would be quite in their power to decide afterwards the question they had been discussing.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, that if that course were adopted, it would, perhaps, be as well to leave out more words than the immediate proposal contemplated.

MR. JAMES STUART said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not withdraw his Amendment, because if these words were not omitted, and if afterwards they did not omit the rest of the clause, all these powers would remain in the hands of the Quarter Sessions as before; but if these were omitted, and they retained the rest of the clause, then it was quite clear they would have gained what was the obvious desire of the majority of the House—namely, a declaration that there should be one and the same control over the Chief Constable and the police. He, therefore, ventured to express a hope that the hon. Gentleman would continue to press his Amendment, so that it might be either carried or lost.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked how the Chairman would put the Question?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Question would be put so as to safeguard the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex. If too many words were omitted, the hon. and gallant Baronet would not be able to move his Amendment in the special form in which it stood on the Paper, but would have to raise the question in some other form.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked whether the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) could not allow these words to be omitted, and then so contrive his Amendment afterwards as to render it admissible?

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.) said, it appeared to him that if the words were struck out it would be altogether impossible for him to raise the question at all, because the Committee would then have decided that the Chief Constable should not be in the hands of the magistrates, and they would also have decided that there should be a dual control. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby knew perfectly well what these questions were, and that if a Member missed his opportunity of making a statement and taking a Division on that which he believed to be of the utmost importance in the interests of the country he might never obtain it again. His view was that the police should remain in the future as they had been in the past—in the hands of the magistrates. He had contended for that from the beginning—since he spoke on the second reading; and he had not deviated one hair's-breadth from his earliest declaration. So far as he knew, he had always had the courage of his opinions, most certainly when he believed it to be in the interests of his country. He should, therefore, like to have an opportunity of placing before the Committee the views he so strongly entertained on this question.

MR. JAMES STUART: I rise to Order—

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he understood it to be the wish of the Committee that his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) should have an opportunity of raising the question in the most distinct form, and if he were unable to do so under the circumstances now stated, the best course would be to move to report Progress, in order that he might himself place on the Paper an Amendment to carry out the object he desired. The subject the hon. and gallant Baronet wished to deal with was, no doubt, a more important one than that now under consideration.

MR. JAMES STUART said, he rose to a point of Order. He desired to point out that the hon. Gentleman who stood in the way of this Question being put could equally well get his point raised before the House by moving the rejection of the remainder of the clause. The hon. and gallant Member could add before the words "Chief Constable" words which would hand the rest of the police over to the control of the Quarter Sessions. If, after the Amendment before the Committee should have been passed, the hon. and gallant Baronet moved the rejection of the last part of the clause, he would, if he succeeded in his Motion, practically do the same thing as he desired to do by his present Amendment, for the control of the rest of the police would vest in the Quarter Sessions. He (Mr. James Stuart) therefore hoped that there would be no adjournment of the debate now, and that they would be allowed to proceed to a Division on the question they had debated for a long time, and which was now ripe for decision.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he ventured to differ from the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. As a matter of fact, the Committee had not debated for a single moment the question whether the police should be under the control of a joint committee. The question the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was asked to settle was the question as to the control of the magistrates. ["No, no!"] Yes; and, for his (Mr. Chaplin's) part, he sincerely hoped the hon. and gallant Baronet would accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. It seemed to him (Mr. Chaplin) that they had got into a very considerable muddle, and that it was very desirable that they should have a fresh and full opportunity of discussing this question of the police. In order that they might have that opportunity, he begged leave to move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he hoped the Motion would not be pressed. He did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) that they had got into a muddle at all. The House seemed to be entirely agreed on one point—namely, that the authority over the Chief Constable ought not to be separated from the Police Authority. They differed, no doubt, as to what the Police Authority ought to be; but they were all agreed that the appointment of the Chief Constable should rest with the Police Authority. Well, having now discussed the question of the Chief Constable for some time, all they had to do was to get that out of the way and leave the road clear for the discussion as to who was to be the Police Authority. There certainly was no desire to prevent the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for North-West Sussex from raising the question in the clearest form, but it would be raised on subsequent words. All the hon. and gallant Baronet would have to do would be, when those words came on, to oppose their addition to the clause. If that was so, why should they allow all the time they had devoted to the discussion of this particular point now before the Committee to be wasted?

MR. RITCHIE said, he believed the right hon. Gentleman was under a misconception when he said that the Committee were entirely agreed that whatever might be the authority for the control of the police the appointment of the Chief Constable should rest there. He did not agree with all that—that the matter was decided unanimously, or that they were anything like unanimous upon it. What he believed was that it was the expressed wish of the Committee that the question of who was to have the control of the police should be decided before that of who was to appoint the Chief Constable. ["No, no!"] That was the proposal of the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), and it was supported by some of his (Mr. Ritchie's) hon. Friends behind him. The Government had thought that, on the whole, this was not an unreasonable proposition to make. The question then arose how it could best be done. It was suggested that the first words of the clause should be left out, on the clear understanding that, whatever the decision was which the Committee might arrive at as to the control of the police, the matter would be revived again in another form. That was the distinct understanding. Then they arrived at the question of the best mode of amending the clause so as to decide the question of controlling the police; and it was because there was some doubt as to the best means of doing that, that the Motion to report Progress was made. The Government would not consent to report Progress on the understanding that the same Body that had the control of the police was to have also the appointment of the Chief Constable; but only on the understanding that the question of the Body into whose hands the control of the police was to be given should be decided, so that the Committee might afterwards come to a conclusion as to the Body into whose hands should be committed the appointment of the Chief Constable.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Sir William Harcourt

CUSTOMS (WINE DUTY) BILL.

[BILL 293.]

COMMITTEE. [Progress 15th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4 (When claim to be made and proved, and on what value).

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 4, to add—"The said Commissioners may require that no consignment or parcel of wine as to which a claim is made under this section shall include wine of different values."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.) said, he would suggest that "invoice" would be a better term than "consignment."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he would be quite prepared to add the word "invoice."

Amendment proposed, to amend the proposed Amendment, by adding after the word "parcel," the words "or invoice."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven) said, he had given Notice of a Motion to omit the clause; but he had received an intimation from those who in this matter he represented that having regard to the fact that the principle of an ad valorem duty was established by the 3rd clause, objectionable and remarkable as that was, yet, it being established, they had requested him not to pursue any further his objection to the Bill. He should not, therefore, move any of the Motions for the omission of clauses standing in his name.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 (Power to buy for the Crown).

MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.) said, he thought that to make the meaning quite clear, some words were required, so that the importer might not think the price meant exclusive of bottling and packing.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 15, after the word "gallon," to insert the words "including cost of bottling, packages, and all charges"—(Mr. S. Williamson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, this point had been carefully considered by the Legal Officers of the Customs, and they were of opinion that, as the clause stood, it quite conveyed what the hon. Member wished to accomplish, that seized goods included all packages; and the words proposed would rather tend to imply a doubt where no doubt in fact existed, and rather complicate than clear up matters.

MR. S. WILLIAMSON said, that, though not quite satisfied, he was quite ready to withdraw his Amendment, deferring to legal opinion.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) said, he had no wish to oppose the clause; but he would renew his suggestion that when the Customs elected to buy goods valued for ad valorem duty they should do so with an addition of 10 per cent.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he was aware his right hon. Friend made the suggestion the other day; but he did not see why they should be influenced by the considerations then put forward, and that a man should pay an additional 10 per cent when the goods were of the declared value of 30s. a dozen. Surely it would be illogical to do so.

MR. CHILDERS said, he did not press the matter; but the rule was that formerly in force here, and was universally in force in foreign countries.

MR. GOSCHEN said, there was a distinction between a fixed duty as in this case and a fluctuating ad valorem duty, and in this case the value was more easily ascertained.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

Clause 8 (Definition of market value).

On the Motion of Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, the following Amendments made:—In page 2, line 25, after "wine," insert "purchased and;" in line 26, after "paid," insert "or contracted to be paid."

MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.) said, he had an Amendment to the clause, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had an Amendment of the same import. Believing, however, that his own form of words was the better, he would move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 26, after the word "him," to insert the words "in bond, or the cost to him bottled in cases or packages, including freight and all foreign transit charges to place the wine in bond at the port of discharge."—(Mr. S. Williamson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, practically this Amendment would be accomplished by the words his right hon Friend proposed to insert subsequently. He would point out that if a case of wine imported by a private consumer was to be admitted at its market value in bond, it would not have been necessary to separate the two cases of wine imported by a consumer and by a merchant. But it was felt that in the case of the consumer the invoice and documents would show exactly what he was to pay for it, and probably the cost so determined would be rather higher than the cost in bond as imported by a merchant or trader. The question had been carefully considered, and he was advised by the Legal Officers that the words after "Customs," "including freight and all other charges," would accomplish what the hon. Member desired.

MR. S. WILLIAMSON said, he would admit the words were to the same import; but he thought his Amendment necessary, because, although there was the word "consumer," there was no guarantee that the consumer was not a small trader also. Still, he had no wish to press his Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he could assure the hon. Member that the words, "all other charges," included the point he alluded to.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 30, after the word "Customs," to insert the words, "but including freight and all other charges."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (As to medicated wine).

MR. S. WILLIAMSON (Kilmarnock, &c.) said, he supposed that all wines taken for health were in a certain sense medical, but he proposed that wines of a special medical character should bear a descriptive label as such.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 4, after the word "wine," to insert the words "and labelled as such."—(Mr. S. Williamson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, he thought the words proposed did make the intention more clear.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven) said, he did not object to the Amendment; but he thought his right hon. Friend ought to explain what these extraordinary compounds were—"wine of a character usually sold as medicated or medical wine." He had never heard of it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might give some justification for introducing these compounds without the payment of duty. His own idea was that if he made an exception at all, he would subject these compounds to a double duty.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, his right hon. Friend need not be afraid that these wines would ever be put on the table, or consumed with pleasure by any person. They were not wines, but drugs. Practically they were certain decoctions prescribed by doctors, and commonly known as medicated wines.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) asked, were there really any such among sparkling wines?

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was advised there was a small proportion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 11 (Commissioners of Customs to act under Treasury).

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) said, his impression was that the Customs always acted under the directions of the Treasury. What, then, was the object of the clause?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he really was unable to give a thorough explanation. If the right hon. Gentleman thought the clause would be better omitted, he had no objection; but, at the same time, the Solicitors to the Customs were very able men, and they suggested the clause. Still, he was bound to say he had no strong argument to support it.

MR. CHILDERS said, not knowing why the draftsman had inserted the clause, he could not take the responsibility of moving to omit it. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would satisfy himself by the Report, that the words were necessary. If they were not necessary, their effect would probably be mischievous.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) said, it was true the Customs always acted under the control of the Commissioners of the Treasury; but he understood that, on several occasions when these words had not been inserted, the House had demanded that they should be. The words were inserted rather to meet what was believed to be the wish of the House than because there was really any necessity for them.

MR. CHILDERS said, the House had often made mistakes by the insertion of superfluous provisions in Bills. But he was content to let the matter rest until the Report stage.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he would prefer not to leave anything over for Report, and the clause had better be omitted.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause be omitted,"—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,)—put, and agreed to.

Clause 12 (Repeal) agreed to.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) said, the new clause he had to propose provided that in case an importer should be obliged to produce invoices, books, or documents in confirmation of his declaration of value, he should not be bound to produce such for the inspection of any Customs official who was also director, manager, or in any way engaged in the management of any co-operative association or firm dealing in wines and spirits. The object of the proposal was to meet the very natural feeling in the trade, that their books and trade transactions should not be submitted to a possible rival in trade. He would formally move the clause, though he would not press it now; but he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider the grievance and the manner in which it could be met.

New Clause (Importer not bound to produce invoice and documents to directors of co-operative stores,)—(Sir Robert Fowler,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he quite appreciated the object of his hon. Friend and of those who had set him in motion. There doubtless would be an impropriety if traders were obliged to exhibit their books and papers to the examination of possible rivals in trade. But he would go somewhat further, and say it was not a satisfactory position for an officer of the Customs to be an official in the management of co-operative stores. He would undertake to look into the matter; but he should be sorry to insert a clause of this character in the Bill, for it might fairly be regarded as a slur upon the Customs Service. He would like to take the opportunity to testify to the honesty and steady fidelity with which officers of the Customs Service discharged their duties; there was no branch of the Civil Service upon which more reliance could be placed. It would appear to cast an undeserved slur upon the Service, to insert these words in an Act of Parliament. He would, however, inquire, and see if by regulation it was expedient to remove all possibility of officers being suspected of dealing with invoices, &c. for trade purposes.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (LIFE SAVING APPLIANCES) BILL [Lords].

[BILL 290.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.) said, he did not know whether the House would be disposed to take the second reading of the Bill. It was prepared in accordance with the Report of the Select Committee of last Session which inquired into the means of saving life at sea. Shipowners, skippers, and seamen had framed and submitted to the Board of Trade suggestions for the preservation of life on passenger ships, and the outcome was the Bill, the principle of which, he believed, would recommend itself to the House. He should be happy to comply with the desire of hon. Members interested in the subject by referring the Bill to a Grand Committee, or taking the Committee in the House with full opportunity for discussion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

Clause 3 (Definitions).

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in moving the omission of the last subsection of the 3rd clause—

"Students' representative council means students' representative council in any University, constituted in such manner as shall be fixed by the Commissioners under this Act," said, the Bill proposed to impose on the Commissioners the duty of laying down regulations for the constitution and functions of the Students' Representative Council, and it proceeded to enact by another section that "the Rector may, before he appoints an assessor, confer with the Students' Representative Council." That was to say, the Bill virtually directed the Lord Rector to consult the Students' Representative Council with regard to the appointment of his assessor. That was the only duty imposed on the Representative Council by the Bill. He submitted that it was not desirable to constitute a regularly organized Representative Council of students for that purpose only. It was a very difficult duty to impose on the Commissioners. The undergraduates or students were a fluctuating body. Every few weeks there were changes in their number, and it would be very difficult indeed for the Commissioners to lay down satisfactory rules for organizing them. But, quite apart from that fact, the one duty they were to discharge under this Bill was, perhaps, the duty which, of all others, they were not competent to discharge—namely, to select an assessor who was to be a practical man, who was to assist in managing the property of the University, and who must necessarily have business qualifications. He thought the students, of all bodies they could mention, would have the least facilities of knowing who were the men possessing these qualifications. Further than that, he considered a proposal of this sort was objectionable in principle. It was quite true that the students of the Scottish Universities had enjoyed from time immemorial the privilege of electing their Lord Rector, and no one would think of taking it from them; but here they were proposing to recognize the students as a part of the University, just as much as they recognized the Senatus or the General Council. Such a proposal had never been made with reference to any University in any other part of the world, nor, so far as he knew, up to the present time had any such proposal been made with regard to the Scottish Universities. He hoped the noble Marquess would give some very strong reason for introducing such a change. When he (the Earl of Camperdown) mentioned the matter the other day, the noble Marquess did not on that occasion even allege that any great advantage would be obtained by it. He hoped their Lordships would not sanction this change, because it was urged that it was not likely to do any great harm. The change was one of principle, and if they made it, let them by all means go a great deal further, and say that the Representative Council of the students were to appoint an assessor. Their Lordships would see that hereafter, the body of students having been once recognized, their Representative Council would, no doubt, make claim to be recognized in other matters connected with the discipline of the University. He did not think it was to the advantage of the Scottish Universities that such a principle as this should be introduced. When he was an undergraduate he should have thought this a very improper proposal, and he held the same view of it now.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 13, leave out "Students' representative council means a students' representative council in any University, constituted in such manner as shall be fixed by the Commissioners under this Act." — (The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN) admitted that there was a great deal of force in what the noble Earl had said. He also admitted that the principle was a new one. At the same time, he could not help thinking it would be a great advantage if the students were recognized in the fashion proposed by the Bill. The Representative Council had, in his opinion, been productive of great good in the way of promoting order and bringing about a better and higher tone among the students themselves. That, he thought, ought to be encouraged in every way, and he did not see any better way than that which the Bill proposed. The noble Earl said there would be only one duty imposed on the Representative Council. He quite admitted that, but it did not follow, because only one duty was imposed in the Bill, that other and more useful work might not be done by the Council. The sense of responsibility which they would have by statutory recognition like this would have great effect upon such a Body. He could not, therefore, accept the Amendment, and hoped the noble Earl would not press it.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he agreed with his noble Friend opposite that it was a mistake to put the students in this position of being advisers of the Lord Rector in the choice of his assessor. He hoped the noble Marquess would even yet see his way to consent to the omission of the sub-section. He asked whether the word "may" in the clause would not be read as meaning "must?"

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, with regard to the point raised by his noble Friend, he did not think it would have any practical effect if the noble Marquess were to consent to the omission of the sub-section, because, as a matter of fact, an indication had been given by the introduction of the clause in the Bill. He was not arguing whether it was right or wrong to have introduced the clause, but they might depend upon it that, after this, the students would always exact from candidates for the Lord Rectorship a pledge that he should consult them or practically listen to their voice completely in the appointment of his assessor. Therefore, whether they took in the clause or not, the object of the Government, which, he confessed, he did not clearly understand, was at any rate attained. But he was not sure whether, now that the clause was in and likely to remain, it would not be wise to give it an ampler signification. His noble Friend said he thought it a mistake that the Students' Representative Council should be instituted for this purpose alone. He was not sure that he did not agree with him to that extent. He thought the students of the Scottish Universities occupied a position which was not identical with that of undergraduates at the English Universities, and he must say he saw some clear benefit from this clause if they carried it a little further. For the Students' Representative Council simply to give advice as to the appointment of an assessor was evidently a superfluity. It ought to go a great deal further, and he would suggest to the noble Marquess that he might see his way to make it open to the Students' Representative Council to make it one of their functions to be enabled to lay propositions or remonstrances before the University Court. He thought there was some advantage to be gained by the University Court in having that responsible Body to deal with; and, on the other hand, it would to some extent meet the complaints of the students when they had direct access to the University Court. He merely threw this out as a suggestion; but, as regarded the clause, he did not think the objection of his noble Friend would be served by the withdrawal of the sub-sections.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN remarked that he had taken advice as to the meaning of the word "may," and he had been assured it did not mean "must." It was simply a direction to the Lord Rector that he might, if he chose, take the advice of the Students' Representative Council in the appointment of his assessor. The Rector was not constantly in attendance at the University Court, and his assessor represented him, and through him the students. If the Rector's assessor were nominated through any other source than directly through himself or the Students' Representative Council, he could not be directly representative of the students. Therefore he thought it desirable to retain the sub-section.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he saw a great difference between the word "may" and the word "must;" and, unless he was misreported, the Lord Advocate stated to a deputation of Scottish students that "may" in this clause meant "must."

LORD WATSON said, he thought the word "may" was permissive; but, practically, it would be imperative on everyone who desired to be elected Lord Rector by the vote of the students. He agreed with other noble Lords in thinking that the Students' Representative Councils should have some other function than that proposed in this Bill, and he believed their grievance would be met by following out the suggestions of the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery), and giving them the same right to make representations which the General Council had under the Act of 1858.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (University Courts).

LORD WATSON, in moving to substitute, in the case of each University Court, the following as the representation of the affiliated Colleges for that proposed in the Bill:—

"Such number of representatives of affiliated colleges, not exceeding four, as may be appointed under and subject to, the arrangements made in terms of section 14, sub-section of this Act," said, these Amendments were consequential on the clause which the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Rosebery) proposed to add to Section 15, and which, he understood, the noble Marquess was prepared to accept. The noble Marquess had an Amendment on the Paper which would still make it imperative that representatives of the affiliated Colleges should sit as members of the University Courts for all purposes whatever. He (Lord Watson) thought that ought to be avoided if possible. Under the new clause to be proposed by the noble Earl these matters were left to the agreement of the parties under regulations to be framed by the Commissioners. Then he thought the Legislature ought not to devolve on the Commissioners the duty of saying what should be the number and limit of the University Court. They ought to lay down a limit within which the University Court might determine the mode of appointment and the character of the representation. He had selected the limit of four. Already there was a limit fixed in the Bill in the case of the teachers of the University, and he would take as an illustration the University of Edinburgh, where four representatives were given to 40 Professors and upwards of 3,000 students. However sanguine their expectations might be as to the operation of Section 15, he did not think anyone would suggest that within the next century or half-century there would come into the University, under the provisions of that clause, a body of Professors or of students of that size.

The Earl of Rosebery

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, he was quite willing to accept the Amendment, and thought the statement he had made would show that—at any rate for a long time to come—the numbers proposed would be sufficient.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD WATSON said, he proposed to move to amend the clause further, in order to provide that, instead of one assessor retiring and one being elected annually, two assessors should retire and two be elected once every two years. The cost of an election was as much for one assessor as for two, and would amount he believed, to £300 or £400 for the four Universities.

Amendment moved,

In page 4, line 39, to leave out the words “one such assessor shall retire from office in each year,” and insert, “two such assessors shall retire from office every two years.”—(The Lord Watson.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, he hoped the noble and learned Lord would not press the Amendment. He believed the cost did not amount to anything like what was stated, but that, on the contrary, it did not exceed £60. He knew a different view was held by the Senatus, but, looking to the fact that the University Councils were the persons mostly interested, as he had received no remonstrance from them as to the clause as it stood, he could not agree to the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Powers of University Court).

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that Sub-section 3 vested in the University Court the power of reviewing decisions arrived at by the Senatus. He asked the noble Marquess if he did not think some limit of time should be fixed for objections, because otherwise objections might be raised at very inconvenient dates?

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN agreed that it was desirable to fix some limit. Perhaps the noble Earl would suggest one.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he would consider the point.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (General Council).

On the Motion of the Earl of CAMPERDOWN, Amendment made in page 7, line 41, by leaving out (“ten”) and inserting (“twenty”).

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14 (Powers of Commissioners).

Amendment moved, to add the following as a new sub-section:—

“The making provision for payment to the Senatus Academicus of such annual sums as may be required to enable every body to perform its statutory functions.”—(The Lord Watson.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, he thought the Amendment was unnecessary.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN hoped the noble Marquess would, on further consideration, accept the Amendment.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY said, he also hoped the noble Marquess would find it convenient to carry out the principle of the Amendment. Unless the provision were put in that form, the Senatus would simply receive a fixed sum provided by the Commission at the time, whereas it ought to be a changeable and adaptable sum.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN admitted that the principle was a right one, and his impression was that the power existed in the Bill. As, however, there appeared to be some doubt about the matter, he would consider the point before the third reading.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 15 (Extension of the Universities).

Amendment moved, to insert the following additional sub-section:—

“To make arrangements, where it shall seem requisite, for the due representation of the University Court in the governing body of affiliated colleges, and of the governing body of affiliated colleges in the University Court, having regard to the circumstances of each particular case, to the relative numbers in the University and the college of the teaching staff, and of students proceeding to graduation, to the nature of the connection proposed to be established, and to the purposes for which such representation is desirable.”—(The Earl of Rosebery.)

LORD HERRIES said, that if the Commissioners made use of the power thus entrusted to them, they could insist on the University Court being represented on the governing body of every school or college to be affiliated to the Universities. That appeared to him a very serious matter. If, as he hoped and trusted, denominational schools should wish to be affiliated, it might happen that the University Court, with a majority consisting of members of the Church of Scotland, would insist that a member of their body should be on the governing body of the denominational schools; whether Episcopal, or Roman Catholic, or Presbyterian. He thought the clause should be amended so as not to make it obligatory on the University Court to be represented on the governing bodies of those Colleges, because he was afraid that otherwise it would prevent many Colleges from becoming affiliated.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he did not think the objection had any foundation in fact. After all, they must remember that affiliation under the Bill was to be carried on by the mutual consent of both parties, and if a college wishing to be affiliated made it a condition that the University should not be represented on its governing body, and such affiliation was, nevertheless, desirable, he did not think that the Commissioners would insist upon a condition which would put an end to the scheme of affiliation. The words were not obligatory by any means. They were to enable arrangements to be made where they were deemed requisite, and he did not think a governing body would be so insane, or the Commissioners so unwise, as to introduce a condition which would be absolutely unacceptable to the college treating for affiliation, and which would put an end to all possibility of affiliation.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, that he had carefully considered the noble Earl's (the Earl of Rosebery's) Amendment, and the noble Lord (Lord Herries) might be assured that, if it had been open to the objection raised by him, the Government would not have accepted it; but as the noble Earl had pointed out, it was purely optional, and, therefore, the fears which the noble Lord had expressed would not be realized.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16 (University of St. Andrew's Powers).

Lord Herries

On the Motion of the Marquess of LOTHIAN the following new Sub-section was added:—

"In the event of the said University College being affiliated to the said University, to regulate the time, place, and manner of the first election of the assessors to be elected to the University Court by the General Council, and by the Senatus Academicus of the said University after such affiliation—which election the Commissioners shall appoint to take place as soon as conveniently may be after such affiliation; and the assessor then in office shall demit office on the date of such election."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 20 (Power to University Court to alter ordinances).

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he moved to delete Sub-section 1, giving power to alter ordinances with respect to the appropriation of the sum allotted to such University by the Commissioners out of the annual grant. By striking out that sub-section and making the words general, the University Court would in future have power to make any alteration in the ordinances made by the Commissioners, or any new ordinances.

Amendment moved, to leave out, in page 15, line 20, Sub-section (1).—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, he would consider the matter before the third reading stage.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Further Amendments made; Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 165.)

LORD HERSCHELL said, he rose to ask a question with reference to the scope of the Committee. The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), who spoke in the debate the previous night, appeared to take the view that the usefulness of their Lordships' House depended in the main upon the possibility of its coming into collision with the other House of Parliament. It appeared to him, however, that their Lordships' House did perform, and might perform, most useful functions in cases in which there could be no possible danger of such a collision. It appeared to him also that their Lordships had very large and useful functions to perform in reviewing and revising the work of the other House of Parliament when it came up for consideration. During the whole of the present Session, and probably the whole of the past Session, in dealing with measures which had come from the House of Commons, their Lordships had dealt with them in such a manner as to involve no risk of collision between the two Houses. Their Lordships had been able to make useful Amendments, which would cause the work of the House of Commons to operate better than it would have done had no such revision taken place. It appeared to him that it would be extremely desirable to make the work done by their Lordships in that direction as effective as possible. There were many cases in which the object was one upon which they all agreed, and the general method to be pursued might command common assent. Yet the success of the measure might, to a great extent, depend on the careful thinking out of details, and in seeing that its provisions were consistent and coherent. He did not think this work was so well done as it might be. The measures which came before their Lordships were of various kinds. If they excited considerable political hostility they were carefully examined, their provisions were critically scanned. But if, as often was the case, the measures did not excite that keen political interest, though useful and important in their character, then too frequently it was the business of no one in particular to look into them. If the measure happened to be one which interested a particular Member of the House, the provisions most likely were carefully examined; but even that precaution could not always be relied on in the case of all Bills. It had in these circumstances occurred to him that Standing Orders Committees of their Lordships' House might be appointed each Session, somewhat similar to the Grand Committees in the House of Commons, to which certain Bills might be referred, unless the House otherwise ordered. Such Committees would then feel it to be their duty to examine the particular Bills referred to them, in order to see whether they needed amendment or could be made more effective. If the Committee were to have the assistance, as they might well have, of one skilled draftsman, whose work should consist in looking critically at the form of legislation, he thought they might be able very often to put the legislation into better shape, and prevent those inconsistencies and blemishes which were often found to greatly mar the measure, and lead to litigation. He would ask the noble Lord, therefore, whether he thought this question was one which would come within the scope of the Reference to the Committee; and, if not, whether he had any objection to the addition of words providing for the matter being considered by the Committee?

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN) said, he cordially endorsed what had been said as to the proceedings of their Lordships' House in revising measures which came from the other House of Parliament. Anything which would in any degree tend to improve or strengthen their dealing with those measures would obviously be of great benefit not only to the proceedings of the House, but also to the progress of legislation in the other House of Parliament. He thought he might express the confident opinion that the Reference to the Committee as it at present existed was sufficient to cover the objects which the noble and learned Lord desired to attain. He had consulted the Prime Minister on the subject, and he also was of the same opinion—that it was not necessary to enlarge the Reference for the purpose mentioned by the noble and learned Lord.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, that had the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) been present he felt sure that he would have objected to the rather paradoxical manner in which the noble and learned Lord represented the opinions of the noble Duke, as expressed the previous evening. He did not think the noble Duke said that the usefulness of their Lordships' House consisted in the possibility of its collision with the other House of Parliament. What he said was only that any measure which would prevent the possibility of any such conflict must also destroy the independence of the House and its power to be useful as a Second Chamber.

QUESTIONS.

PASSENGERS ACT — HOSPITALS OF PASSENGER-CARRYING STEAMERS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Under what circumstances are hospitals on board Transatlantic and foreign-bound passenger-carrying steamers permitted to be used, and for what purposes other than hospital purposes ; by what means can the Board prevent and detect infringement of its Rules on such vessels after the steamer has left port ; on how many Transatlantic steamers are there dispensaries properly fitted up and apart from the hospital or surgeon's room ; are precautions always taken that the hospitals are so situated that sick and injured can always, and in all weather, be readily taken there without undue risk or exposure, and do any Rules exist having regard to the location of such hospitals ; and, are precautions taken by the Board of Trade Inspectors with respect to the relative positions of the surgeon's cabin and hospitals, that the latter shall be in every weather easy of access to the medical officer ?

THE PRESIDENT (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, he had no knowledge of any cases in which the hospital spaces in the vessels coming under the Passengers Act had been permitted to be used for other than hospital purposes ; but in cases of emergency—such as the rescue of a crew and passengers of another ship—any space not required for patients might possibly be so utilized. The Board of Trade had no means of preventing or detecting infringements of its Rules after a vessel had left port ; but if any evidence was brought to his notice which would justify a prosecution he would certainly act upon it. The Board of Trade had no power to institute any requirements as to the fitting up or situation of the dispensaries on the Transatlantic steamers ; but he understood that the Rules laid down in the Passengers Act were complied with, and that dispensaries were so situated that patients could, in all weathers, be readily taken there without undue risk or exposure. He could give the hon. Member no information as to the relative positions of surgeons' cabin and hospitals. The Board of Trade had no power in the matter.

DR. TANNER asked, with reference to the first portion of the right hon. Gentleman's answer, whether it was only under such circumstances as he had described that hospital accommodation would be used in these vessels ?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that was his belief. He had made the best inquiry in his power into the matter, and he had told the hon. Member all he knew. He would promise the hon. Member that if any infringement that would warrant a prosecution were brought under his notice a prosecution would be at once begun.

DR. TANNER explained that he had asked repeatedly this Question, in the hope that the Rules of the Board of Trade would be carried out; and he did it for the benefit of poor emigrants who could not possibly have time to get their grievances remedied themselves.

The Earl of Selborne

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he did not at all complain of the hon. Gentleman's Question. He should be happy to have his attention called to any infringement of the Rules that occurred, and would do everything in his power to enforce the law.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—INTERFERENCE OF THE POLICE WITH STREET NEWSPAPER VENDORS AT CORK.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if he is aware that the following cases of police interference with, and intimidation of, street newspaper vendors have occurred in the City of Cork—namely, Denis Desmond (young lad), who refused to sell to a policeman a copy of United Ireland, arrested by Sergeant Kennedy, and detained for a short time in Bridewell; Denis M'Carthy (young lad), refused to sell a copy of The Cork Examiner to Police Sergeant Power, arrested by Sergeant Power, taken to the Bridewell, and detained there for some time; John Radley (young lad), refused to sell a copy of United Ireland and Cork Examiner to policeman, arrested by Sergeant Power, taken to Bridewell, and detained there for some time; Cornelius Coakley (young lad), arrested for refusing to sell to policeman a copy of United Ireland and Cork Examiner by Sergeant Power, taken to the Bridewell, and detained there for some time; Patrick Bradley (young lad), arrested under circumstances similar to the above by Sergeant Power; Patrick Carleton (young lad), refused to sell a copy of Cork Herald to policeman, arrested by Sergeant O'Leary, and lodged in Bridewell for some time; Michael Murphy (an old man of 70), he refused to sell a copy of the Examiner to policeman on beat, and the policeman kicked the old man's box about, scattered his papers, cuffed the old man, and warned him against selling the newspaper; and, whether, in view of these occurrences, he will order an independent inquiry into these matters?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): A man named Denis Desmond, described as a porter, and who was a considerable time ago a news vendor, was arrested by Constable Lambert on a charge of drunkenness, and subsequently committed to prison in default of payment of a fine of 5s. Denis M'Carthy and John Radley were arrested by Sergeant Power, not for refusing in either case to sell a copy of any newspaper, but for street obstruction and refusing to move on. Cornelius Coakley does not appear to have been arrested at all by Sergeant Power. He was, however, summoned by Constable Barber for stone-throwing in the streets, and fined 5s. Bartholomew (not Patrick) Bradley was arrested, not by Sergeant Power but by Constable Donoghue, for street obstruction, and discharged at the police-court with a caution. Patrick Carleton was not arrested by Sergeant O'Leary, nor can his arrest for any offence be traced. Michael Murphy states that some time ago a policeman gave his box a kick without any cause, but did not touch himself, and that it had nothing to do with the sale of a paper to the policeman. None of the persons named were, therefore, arrested in connection with the sale of, or refusal to sell, the papers, but for other offences; and on the occasion of two of these persons being before the police-court, one of the Local Justices is reported to have said that—

“He took that opportunity of stating that the misconduct of news vendors in the streets of the city was becoming intolerable, and should be put a stop to.”

MR. FLYNN said, arising out of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, if he laid before the right hon. Gentleman affidavits by the following persons with regard to certain circumstances, would he then undertake to institute the independent inquiry which he had asked for—namely, that Denis Desmond, mentioned in this Question, refused to sell a copy of a newspaper to the constable mentioned. The constable said to him—“I will make you give it. Come along with me.” He then took him into custody, and on the way to the Bridewell he asked him—“Will you give me the paper before I put you in?” and having taken the boy as far as the Bridewell he then released him. The affidavit also of John Radley, 17 years of age, who has been selling papers in Cork for a number of years, stated that he was arrested by Sergeant Power, also mentioned in the Question, because he refused to sell him a copy of The Cork Examiner. He was arrested and taken to the Bridewell.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is now exceeding the limits of a Question. He is simply making a counter statement.

MR. FLYNN asked the right hon. Gentleman if he laid these affidavits before him would he grant the inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he should be delighted to consider any information the hon. Member laid before him.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) asked, what was the meaning of the expression "street obstruction?"

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, it was a well understood definition; but he did not like to give any express meaning to it.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast W.) said, with reference to the reply of the right hon. Gentleman that these arrests were made for street obstruction, he wished to ask him if it were not the fact that the question of obstruction of the streets had been always left by the Authorities in the hands of the Corporation of Cork; and, also, whether it was not a fact that the arrests on various pretences of men and boys selling newspapers had only begun since the right hon. Gentleman desired to suppress the sale of certain newspapers in Ireland; and, further, whether the arrests of newspaper vendors in Ireland had been discontinued or not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not quite catch the drift of the Question. He apprehended that it was the duty of the police to see that street obstruction did not take place.

MR. FLYNN: Arising out of that answer—

MR. SPEAKER: Order! Mr. Harris.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND)—A TOWN HALL, &c. FOR BALLINASLOE.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) (for Mr. HARRIS) (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the inhabitants of Ballinasloe suffer great inconvenience for want of a Town Hall that could be used as a place for the transaction of public business; that there are two Halls in the town—namely, the Agricultural Hall and the Farming Society Building, both of which were erected for public uses and in a great degree by public money, but have now passed into the hands of the ground landlords who have rented them to private individuals; and, whether he is aware that the Town Commissioners have been unable to secure the Agricultural Hall as a Town Hall, though they offered to give the same rent for it as is paid at present; and, if so, would the Local Government Board, by their advice or otherwise, aid the townspeople of Ballinasloe in their legal efforts to get possession of this Hall?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Town Clerk at Ballinasloe states that inconvenience is felt for want of a Town Hall; also that the two Halls referred to are used for commercial purposes; and further, that the landlord of the Agricultural Hall had refused to dispossess the present tenant when the Town Commissioners asked him to rent the building to them. The Local Government Board will give due attention to any application made to them by the Ballinasloe Town Commissioners to sanction a loan to provide a building for a Town Hall. The Board have no further power in the matter.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND)—A PUBLIC NUISANCE IN BALLINASLOE.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) (for Mr. HARRIS) (Galway, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that in the most central position in Ballinasloe there are sheds which are used as slaughter-houses, which emit a most offensive odour, dangerous to the health of the town; that the inhabitants of Ballinasloe and the Town Commissioners signed a requisition asking Lord Clancarty to remove those sheds, on the ground that they were a public nuisance, an impediment to the traffic, and a disfigurement to the town; that his Lordship refused, on the ground that they were a market house, in which his family had a vested interest of such a nature that he had no legal right to disturb it, especially as it had relation to the tolls and customs; and, if so, would the Local Government

Board interfere and cause the removal of these sheds, and thus prevent the expense of a law-suit?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It appears that the Town Commissioners have made representations to the landlord of the nature indicated in the Question, and that he has declined to act on them for the reasons stated. The Town Clerk, however, reports that at present no offensive odours are emitted from the premises referred to, as the owner has taken steps to keep them in a cleanly condition. The Ballinasloe Urban Sanitary Authority have extensive powers under the Public Health Act to deal with the case of nuisances arising within their district, and it is their duty to remedy any such state of things.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked, would the Assistant Commissioner be making any inquiry at Ballinasloe as to the market tolls there?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he could not answer the Question without Notice.

DOMINION OF CANADA—IMMIGRATION OF DESTITUTE LABOURERS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware that the Toronto Trades and Labour Council complain that the immigration into Canada of destitute labourers from Great Britain is encouraged by persons in England describing themselves as Government agents; whether William Barlow, of 106a, Market Street, Manchester, correctly describes himself as "Government Immigration Agent," and as "appointed passage broker by the Board of Trade;" and, whether representations circulated by William Barlow as to the state of the labour market in Canada have any official sanction?

THE PRESIDENT (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH) (Bristol, W.), in reply, said, he could give no information as to immigration to Canada. That was rather a Question for the Colonial Department. He gathered from newspaper reports that the Toronto Trades and Labour Council had made the complaint referred to in the Question. The person named William Barlow mentioned in the Question was not, as far as he could learn, included in the records of the Office in the list of licensed passage brokers, who were licensed by the local magistrates under the sanction of the Board; but he was informed that several licensed passage brokers had appointed Barlow as their agent.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION—EVIDENCE BEFORE THE JOINT COMMITTEE.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the sum of £1,429, referred to in last Tuesday's evidence before the Joint Committee on Private Bill Legislation, as having been paid to the Glasgow Boundaries Commissioners and their clerks, was paid by the Treasury or by the City of Glasgow?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The sum in question was paid by the City of Glasgow.

MR. HOZIER: Arising out of that answer, may I ask the Lord Advocate whether it is customary for one of the parties interested in the decision of a Commission to recompense the Members of the Commission?

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: I am not aware.

INLAND REVENUE—ENGLISH-GROWN TOBACCO.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been directed to an exhaustive experiment made by Messrs. Cope and Co. in the manufacture of an extensive crop of English tobacco grown by Messrs. Carter and Co.; and, whether he will cause an inquiry by experts into the results attending the experiment, with the view, if possible, of relaxing the fiscal restrictions upon the culture of tobacco in Great Britain and Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Experiments have been made by Messrs. Carter and Co. in the manufacture of cut and roll tobacco from English-grown leaf. Great care appears to have been exercised in the manufacture of the article; but according to the best information which I have been able to obtain, the result has not been very satisfactory. The tobacco is stated to be deficient in flavour and character; but I should be sorry to use any words which would discourage such experiments being tried. I think that it is only experience which will show the value to smokers of this tobacco. No inquiry by experts would be so valuable as a practical test by hon. Members accustomed to smoke; and if hon. Members wish it a sample of this tobacco will be placed in the Smoking Room. I am afraid there can be no change in the Fiscal Regulations, which are not at present unnecessarily stringent. I am anxious to facilitate the progress of these experiments; but the revenue from tobacco is so large that it is impossible to make any form of relaxation that would in no way threaten the Revenue.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—REMOVAL OF SHERIFF CLERK DEPUTE FROM TOBERMORY TO OBAN.

COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is a fact that the Sheriff Clerk Depute has been removed from Tobermory to Oban, and has taken with him all the ordinary business, or processes in existence, or connected with the Crofting Registry; and, if this is correct, whether he will direct such business to be returned to Tobermory?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The Sheriff Clerk Depute who was formerly at Tobermory is now removed to Oban, which is to be the seat of the Court for the district; but there will be a Sheriff Clerk Depute at Tobermory, and I shall make inquiry as to the arrangements to be made to prevent any avoidable inconvenience in consequence of the change.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—APPLICATIONS FOR FAIR RENTS IN BANTRY DISTRICT.

MR. GILHOLLY (Cork, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether 400 originating notices to have fair rents fixed have been served in the Bantry District on or about last September; whether only 24 have been listed for hearing; and, whether, in view of the fact that several of the landlords in that district have taken legal proceedings to recover the present exorbitant rents, he will provide a remedy for this state of affairs?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners inform me there were 214 applications to fix fair rents lodged with them during the month of September last by tenants in the Poor Law Union of Bantry. A Sub-Commission has been working in the County of Cork since November 1 last, and will continue there until the end of July; but the Commissioners have been unable, consistently with the claims of other Unions, to list more than 25 cases from the Bantry Union. That number includes all applications lodged up to September 26 last. As regards the concluding portion of the Question, the District Inspector of Constabulary reports that, so far as he can at present ascertain, no landlords have taken proceedings to recover rent in the Bantry District in the manner alleged.

MR. GILHOLLY said, he was in possession of information to the effect that landlords were taking legal proceedings against these tenants for the recovery of the exorbitant rents.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he should be happy to receive any information that the hon. Gentleman could lay before him.

WAR OFFICE—FOLKESTONE JUBILEE HOSPITAL—SALE OF LAND IN THE BAYLE.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in respect to the Folkestone Jubilee Hospital, he will decide, without delay, either not to sell the site of the disused battery on the "Bayle" at Folkestone for any purposes whatever, or to sell it for the purposes of the much-needed hospital at a price to be stated, or to put it up to auction; and, whether he is aware that the provision of this Jubilee Hospital has been delayed, for want of a site, for a year and a quarter?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (A LORD of the TREASURY) (Wigton) (who replied) said: It is not yet decided whether the site of the battery on the Bayle shall be sold or not ; but if it is, it will be sold by public auction.

TRADE AND COMMERCE — COUNTY COURT DEPARTMENT, WARWICK—FAILURE OF MESSRS. GREENWAYS' BANK.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any, and what, funds belonging to the Warwick County Court Department were in the hands of Greenways' Bank at the time of its stoppage ; whether such funds stood in the bankers' books as a public or private account ; and, whether any loss to the public will arise therefrom ?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The sum of £362 8s. 11d. belonging to the Warwick County Court Department was in the hands of Greenways' Bank at the time of its stoppage. It stood in the bank books in the name of the Registrar quid Registrar ; and only Court moneys were paid into the account, and only drafts in respect of the Court were drawn upon it. The amount of loss to the public will depend upon the realization of the estate.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked, whether the hon. Gentleman was aware that the Registrar of the Court was a partner of the defaulting bankers ?

MR. JACKSON said, he did not know whether that was so or not. He was having the whole of the circumstances investigated, with the view of ascertaining whether any further steps should be taken.

POLICE COURTS (METROPOLIS)—ACCOMMODATION OF PRISONERS AWAITING TRIAL.

MR. T. FIELDEN (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has yet received a Report from the Committee which he appointed to inquire into the accommodation of prisoners awaiting trial at the Metropolitan Police Courts and at other Courts of Summary Jurisdiction ; and, if so, whether he proposes to lay the Report before Parliament ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.), in reply, said, he had received the Report, which should be laid on the Table.

THE CONSTABULARY FORCE (ENGLAND AND WALES) — THE FIRST REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS IN 1839.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether in view of the importance of circulating correct information as to the County Constabulary and the principles on which the present establishments were founded, he will order the First Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the best means of establishing an efficient Constabulary Force in the Counties of England and Wales, presented in 1839, to be reprinted ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said, the Report was of a voluminous character, and its production would be very costly. In view of the fact that all questions affecting the Constabulary in counties would be settled by the House before it could be published, he did not think any advantage would accrue, and he hoped his hon. Friend would not press for it.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—EVICTIION AT CLOGHER.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following account of an eviction in Ireland, which is taken from a London paper :—

“ An eviction was carried out yesterday on the property of Mr. Montroy Gledstones Fardross, Clogher, telegraphs our Dublin correspondent. Nearly 40 police were in attendance. The evicted family numbers six members. One, a blind boy, received the last sacrament last evening, and the father, an old man of 80 years, was so weak and ill as to appear utterly unconscious of what was going on around him. Another son besought the Sub-Sheriff (Mr. McKelvey) to delay the removal of the father from bed till the parish priest might be sent for, as the arrival of McKelvey had taken the family by surprise, but the officer was inexorable. The old man was then transferred from his bed to a cart, in which he was conveyed to the house of a son-in-law, where he received the last sacrament immediately afterwards from the parish priest ; ” and, whether it is not in the power of the Government to refuse to allow the forces of the Crown to be used in evicting persons under such painful circumstances ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, he was making local inquiries, and had not yet heard the result. His experience was, however, that these sensational reports were invariably grossly inaccurate.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MESSRS. GARDINER AND REDMOND, R.M.—CASTLEMARTYR.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Resident Magistrates Gardiner and Redmond, who on the 31st of May, at Castlemartyr, convicted Thomas Renny of conspiring not to supply goods to a member of the Irish Constabulary, and sentenced him to the fullest term of imprisonment permissible without appeal, were before their appointments as Resident Magistrates officers of the Irish Constabulary; and, for what periods, respectively, did Messrs. Gardiner and Redmond serve in the Irish Constabulary, and what rank did they hold in that force?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Both the Resident Magistrates named served in the Constabulary as officers. Mr. Gardiner served from February 2, 1867, to January 27, 1881; and Mr. Redmond from July 10, 1850, to September 10, 1860. Both held the rank of Sub-Inspector. That title is now changed to District Inspector. Both were declared legally qualified under the Prevention of Crime Act of 1882, and have been likewise declared qualified under the Act of last Session.

MR. MAC NEILL asked the Chief Secretary, whether he would in future try to make some provision when an offence against the Constabulary was tried under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, that ex-Constabulary officers should not exclusively compose the tribunal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I see no reason why such an arrangement should be made.

INLAND REVENUE—EXEMPTION FROM THE INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will allow the terms of the Rule recently made with a view of extending the interpretation of the Treasury Minute of February, 1884, giving exemption from the Inhabited House Duty to tenements under the annual value of £20, to be made public?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The extension which has been made in the concession granted by the Treasury in February, 1884, is as follows:—Where several tenements each structurally separate, and which taken together fall short of £20 annual value, are occupied by the same tenant, they are exempted from payment of duty, just as they would be severally exempt if inhabited by several tenants.

SWITZERLAND — ENGLISH DOCTORS.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.) (for Dr. FARQUHARSON) (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has any further information to give the House as to the result of the negotiations he has been carrying on with the Swiss Government regarding the rights of English doctors to practise in that country?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I am glad to say that, since the hon. Member last inquired on this subject, it has assumed a more hopeful appearance. There is reason to expect that temporary measures will be adopted by certain Cantonal Authorities, by which British physicians will be enabled to practise, and I hope that a permanent and reciprocal arrangement may be arrived at.

MR. CAUSTON asked, whether it was probable that the more favourable arrangement would apply to the whole of Switzerland, and not merely the excepted parts?

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, no effort would be spared to conclude a satisfactory arrangement. There were, as the hon. Member was aware, considerable difficulties in consequence of the Swiss doctors requiring complete reciprocity, which they could not obtain, unless they were allowed to practise in the British Colonies.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE
CURASS, KANTURK.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received any information concerning the arrest of six tenants—namely, Denis Fitzpatrick, P. Murphy, John Field, Thomas Frawley, Timothy Daly, and Daniel Daly, at Curass, near Kanturk, a short time after midnight of Wednesday last, on a charge of unlawful assembly and criminal conspiracy, alleged to have been committed on March 23 last; if he can state why these men were summarily arrested and taken from their beds at this time of night, and not proceeded against in the ordinary way by summons; if he is aware that these men were kept in the police barrack all day on Thursday, from 2 or 3 o'clock a.m. to 7.30 p.m., and then released on bail by Mr. Seagrave, R.M.; and, if these facts are correct, whether he will take steps to prevent untried prisoners in Ireland from being exposed to similar treatment in future?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The District Inspector of Constabulary reports that the prisoners were arrested at about 2 a.m. The matter referred to is, I understand, one that rests in the discretion of the magistrate before whom the informations are laid. The delay in granting bail was due to the absence of the Resident Magistrate at Buttevant Petty Sessions, from which he was unable to return until about 6 p.m. on the day in question. I have given to the House all the information I have been able to obtain, but I will cause further inquiry to be made.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) said, with reference to the reply of the right hon. Gentleman that these men were arrested and taken from their bed at night, he wished to ask him why it was that the Government had waited about three months, and then arrested these men and took them from their beds at night, though they immediately afterwards assented to their release on bail?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have stated just now that I have given all the information I possess to the House; but I am making further inquiries.

MR. FLYNN asked, was not the town of Kanturk in telegraphic communication with London, and had not the Question been down on Friday afternoon?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the hon. Gentleman was paying him an overpowering compliment; because, in spite of assurance that he had given all the information he could, the hon. Member still refused to believe his ignorance.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether the Resident Magistrate, though absent in this case, had been conveniently present at midnight in other cases to send men to gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: said, he knew the Resident Magistrate had been at Petty Sessions.

MR. SEXTON gave Notice that he would repeat the Question on Monday, as he did not believe in the right hon. Gentleman's ignorance.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—
HARBOUR AT ROSSLARE.

MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the facts that upwards of £110,000 of public money has been expended on the harbour at Rosslare and on the railway leading thereto; that the Select Committee of this House on Harbour Accommodation reported in 1884 that the case of Rosslare Harbour was deserving the attention of the Treasury; and that the Royal Commission appointed by the present Government has also reported in favour of its completion, the Government will take a Vote for that purpose during the present Session?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: The recommendation of the recent Royal Commission on Public Works was qualified by the condition that the Harbour of Rosslare should be brought under the same management as that of Wexford. I have no information as to whether such a course would be acceptable to the Local Harbour Authorities at Wexford; and at present, therefore, I do not see my way to re-open the question of a further advance for an extension of the works at Rosslare.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.—[BILL 182.]

(Mr. Ritchie, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Long.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 18th June.]

[EIGHTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

COUNTY COUNCILS.

Powers of County Council.

Clause 7 (Powers as to police).

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 11, leave out from the word "nothing" to the words "constables and," in line 13.—(Mr. Brunner.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Nothing in this Act shall affect' stand part of the Clause."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Ritchie) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, he thought that, in discussing this clause, an arrangement might be made by which the opinion of the House might be taken first upon the question of the control of the police before the question of the appointment of Chief Constable was disposed of. He would, therefore, suggest to the Committee that, in his opinion, this would be best done by striking out the words, "Nothing in this Act shall affect." His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would then move to insert the Amendment of which he had given Notice—namely, to insert after the word "respect," in line 12, the words "county police or." The sentence would then read—"The powers, duties, and liabilities of Quarter Sessions with respect to the county police or," and the whole question of the control of the police would then be raised by a subsequent Motion to leave out the words, "giving the Quarter Sessions power of appointment, controlling, and dismissing the Chief Constables." By adopting that mode the Committee would get rid of a good deal of confusion, and would be able to come to a conclusion on the matter which was discussed last night.

Under these circumstances he proposed to assent to the Amendment now before the Committee to omit the words, "Nothing in this Act shall affect." By taking this course the entire question would be raised as to who should have the control of the county police and the appointment of Chief Constable. If the words giving the "appointment, control, and dismissal of Chief Constables to the Quarter Sessions" were omitted, it would then be better to omit the following words down to the word "to" in line 18, namely—

"And the powers of quarter sessions under section seven of the County and Borough Police Act, 1856, to direct and require constables to perform any duties in addition to their ordinary duties, may be exercised both by quarter sessions and by the county council; but subject as aforesaid, the powers, duties, and liabilities of quarter sessions with respect to."

The clause would then provide that—

"The duties and liabilities of quarter sessions with respect to the county police shall be, on and after the appointed day, vest in and attach to the quarter sessions and the county council jointly, and be exercised and discharged through the standing joint committee of the quarter sessions and county council appointed as hereinafter mentioned."

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said, he thought if the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman were adopted, it would carry out the views of the Government, but how was it proposed to deal with the "appointment, control, and dismissal of chief constables?"

MR. RITCHIE said, that provision would have to be made in that respect afterwards. He was only afraid that they might get confused if they were to attempt to amend the words between. The course he suggested would obviate that difficulty.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, that he had an Amendment on the Paper to insert, after "chief constables," the words "or assistant chief constables." He desired to know how that Amendment would be affected.

THE CHAIRMAN said, if the words proposed to be struck out were omitted, there would be an understanding that they were not struck out adversely, and could be re-instated.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked if the President of the Local Government Board could not state to the Committee what the ultimate intention of the Government was in regard to the control of the police and the Chief Constable.

MR. RITCHIE said, his only object in the suggestion he had made was to afford facilities for coming to a conclusion upon both of these points. He understood from the tone of the discussion last night that it was considered desirable to arrive at a conclusion in reference to the proposal to transfer the control of the police from the Quarter Sessions before they dealt with the question of the appointment of Chief Constables. As the hon. Gentleman asked him what the intentions of the Government were, he might say that they proposed to recommend to the Committee to adhere to the proposals of the Bill.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, the Committee were to understand, then, that the Government adhered to the proposals contained in the Bill, and that all other points beyond were left open for the ultimate discussion of the Committee.

MR. RITCHIE said, the Government intended to adhere to the proposal for vesting the control of the police in a joint committee of the Quarter Sessions and County Council.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.), in moving, in page 5, line 12, after the word "respect," to insert "the county police or," said, he was glad to have this opportunity of placing, as clearly as he was able, some considerations before the Committee why he thought the county police should remain entirely under the control of the magistrates, as they had hitherto been. He was strongly fortified in that opinion by the views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler). That right hon. Gentleman, in one of the clear and lucid speeches he generally delivered, had stated that he believed it would be for the interest of all parties concerned that the police should be under one control. If, then, they could not get the one authority he desired, he presumed the right hon. Gentleman would be prepared to accept the other. The House had already decided by a majority, upon the Motion of the right hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), not to accept the control of the County Council. Therefore the matter remained now in the position in which the Government first introduced the Bill—namely, that the police, as far as the Chief Constable was concerned, should be in the hands of the magistrates; but as far as the management of the police was concerned that it should be in the hands of a joint committee of the magistrates and the County Councils. He was of opinion that that was an unwise proposal, and it was because he thought that it would be far more to the interests of the country that the police should be under the undivided authority of the Quarter Sessions that he was glad to have an opportunity of stating his views upon the subject. When the question of the divided control was last under discussion nearly every Member who got up to take part in the debate, from both sides of the House, thought it would be a most unwise change. If it was unwise then, assuredly it was unwise now, and it should not be said because it was the control of the magistrates that they were now discussing that there were any more grounds for dividing the control than there had been previously. Looking at the case broadly, he thought he had good authority for saying that there had never been any accusation brought against the conduct of the police or of the magistrates over the police, but, on the contrary, they had heard, and they heard it when the Bill was first introduced, that not only had the magistrates done their duty, but that in all they had done, both as to economical management and the maintenance of order, there was nothing to find fault with in reference to their control of the police. Such being the case, before Parliament consented to take the management out of their hands and hand it over to another authority, surely they ought to consider carefully all the circumstances of the case. He had no wish to enter into very grave and debatable matters, but still this was the only opportunity they would have, and he would ask any man whether there were not parts of the country in which, if the police were in the hands of the County Council, very grave effects might be produced upon the police. He thought that was one of the matters they were bound to consider—namely, whether the handing over of the police to the

County Councils would be the wisest and most prudent step they could possibly take. His own view was that it would not be the wisest or most prudent course to hand over the control of the police to any elected and fluctuating body like the Town Councils, and thus remove them from the control of the magistrates, who were magistrates for their lives, and who carried on their duties from day to day and from year to year upon the same footing. There was another matter which he ought to mention which he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton would regard as germane to this subject. His own opinion was that the question deserved more consideration than was given to it at the time it was previously discussed, and that it required more careful consideration than ever now. No doubt they would be able to discuss it very fully when they came to a subsequent clause. But it was now proposed to take out of the counties all towns with 50,000 inhabitants. The effect of that was to get rid of one of the reasons why County Government had been given—namely, that they would have the towns that were situated in the counties associated with the rural portions of the counties. They were now going to have the county without any of the large constituencies, and he should like to know whether the men, other than magistrates, who would be left to carry on the business would be persons who were most fit and proper to undertake it. There was another and most serious matter, with regard to which he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman opposite a question. There were certain duties which would have to be collected in the district. Would the police have anything to do with the levying and collection of such duties? Would they be so employed or would they not? It was a very serious question in the administration of the law whether these men were to be employed to raise the duties which were to be handed over to the Councils by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, especially when it was considered that the large towns were to be struck out. He had no wish to detain the Committee too long, but there was another question which he desired to mention, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) was in his place. The right hon. Gentleman had given the Committee a good many dissertations on this great question. Only the other day the right hon. Gentleman said, and if he were not much mistaken something of the same kind was repeated a short time ago by one in whose authority the right hon. Gentleman placed implicit trust—namely, that if these proposals were carried by the Government and the appointment of Chief Constables were left in the hands of the magistrates, when the Liberal Party came into power again they would reverse the decision of the majority. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] He was delighted to hear that cheer. He trusted it would go forth to the country with all its force that the House of Commons, in the year 1888, for the first time in history, declared that it would not accept the decision of the majority of the House, but that it would do all in its power to reverse that decision, notwithstanding the fact that it was come to by a large majority. But hon. Members remembered how the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) brought forward his great measure with regard to Ireland. What did the right hon. Gentleman state then? He said upon every point that it was a vital question, and that if he were not supported he would throw up the Bill. It would have been far better if the Government had taken the same course in regard to the present Bill. Much as the Conservative Party disliked the legislation of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, when he was in power they had loyally accepted and carried it out. It was an entirely new and unconstitutional doctrine to get up in that House and state that if they were unfortunate enough to be defeated on the other side they would take the earliest opportunity of reversing the decision when they came into power again. He had thought it right to say so much. The Conservative Party always took their beating when they were beaten; but, at the same time, they were always ready to defend the lines of conduct they pursued, and, believing that the best interests of the country depended on the control of the police remaining in the hands which had hitherto so well administered it, he begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 12, after "respect," insert "the county police or."—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) desired to say a word or two in reply to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Baronet, although it was difficult to do so, he was afraid, consistently with Order. As he understood the position, it had been decided against hon. Members on that side of the House that the control of the police and the appointment of the High Constable should not be handed over to the County Councils, but he trusted that he might be allowed to say a word or two in reply to some of the arguments and statements of the hon. and gallant Baronet. The hon. and gallant Baronet was held in the highest esteem on the Opposition as well as on the Ministerial side of the House. He spoke from very long knowledge of the hon. and gallant Baronet in that House. He had never been known to be otherwise than straight and decided and honest in the expression of his views, and he was a man for whom they naturally entertained an unwavering respect. He made no complaint of the course the hon. and gallant Baronet had pursued on this occasion. Everybody knew that the hon. and gallant Baronet did not like the Bill, that he strongly objected to the transfer of these powers from the magistrates to the County Councils in the future, and he was, therefore, consistent in the line he had taken. But the Government had taken another line; they recognized that there was a great demand on the part of the public for a representative county constituency; they had acceded to that demand, or intended to accede to it, in the constitution of the County Councils. They had not carried out that principle, however, in the present clause. Hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House differed from them, and had been beaten, but they had, nevertheless, a right to maintain their opinion. The hon. and gallant Baronet proposed that the police should be left under the control of the Quarter Sessions, and that they should not be handed over to a joint committee of Quarter Sessions and County Councils. As far as the Opposition were concerned, they entirely agreed that it would have been better for the police and the Chief Constables to be left under one authority, if that authority were the County Councils, because they found under the existing law that the magistrates were called upon to perform duties in connection with the maintenance of law and order which they claimed in future for the County Councils, so that they should be modelled on the pattern of the Borough Councils in regard to the administration of police affairs. That was the position of hon. Members on that side of the House. At present they were left in this condition. They had been defeated in that respect, and the question was whether they should vote for the retention of all the powers relating to the police in the hands of the magistrates at Quarter Sessions, or whether they should prefer, although they did not like it, the Government proposal that the police and the Chief Constables should be supervised and managed by a joint committee of two Bodies. Of the two proposals he, at least, preferred that of the Government. He did not prefer it because he liked it. He disliked it exceedingly, and he saw no sufficient justification for it. It appeared to him to be entirely inconsistent with the principles right hon. Gentlemen laid down in the Bill, and he was perfectly justified in notifying to the House, judging as well as he could of the feeling and temper of the Liberal Party both inside and outside the House, that it must not be expected that these proposals were to be permanently and definitely accepted without some attempt to reverse them on some future occasion. The hon. and gallant Baronet said that this was the first time—namely, the year 1888, when such a doctrine had been propounded. He differed entirely from the hon. and gallant Baronet. If he had used it in the way of a threat in order to induce hon. Members to vote with him rather than with the Government, he might have been open to that remark; but his argument was not in the least in the nature of a threat, and he was sure the hon. and gallant Baronet would know that he was not disposed to offer a threat on any occasion. His object had simply been to point out that as far as the Liberal Party, not only in the House, but in the country, were concerned, they were deeply convinced in their own mind of the truth of the principle that the control of the police, whether in the boroughs or in the counties, subject to the proper authority of the magistrates in calling upon them to fulfil the duties laid down by law, should be vested in the hands of those who paid for them—namely, the representative bodies of the towns and counties. He, therefore, could not hold out any expectation that the arrangement would be a permanent one, and that a future opportunity would not be taken for amending these proposals. He had yet to learn that there was anything unconstitutional or novel in announcing to the House that when they got the opportunity they would seek to amend the Bill in a direction which they so greatly desired. He had, therefore, nothing to apologize for or correct in the statement he had made. He had no doubt that the opportunity he desired would occur, and it was a fundamental article of the Liberal creed, whether in the Metropolis in the provincial boroughs, or in the counties that the police should be nominated, appointed, controlled, and paid by the representatives of the people. Although they might be beaten on this occasion he repeated his assertion that on some future day an endeavour would be made to amend the Bill.

MR. RITCHIE said, the right hon. Gentleman had said that it was a fundamental article of the Liberal creed, whether in the country or in the Metropolis, that the police should be in the hands of the ratepayers. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman how long that had been a fundamental article in the Liberal creed, because he remembered a Bill being brought in a very few years ago, when it was quite true that the Liberal Party were not identified with all the opinions and views of the Liberal Party now, for the Government of the Metropolis by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) which proposed to ignore its fundamental article altogether. Therefore he might assume that this fundamental article was one which had been grafted on the Liberal creed since the introduction of the Bill of the right hon.

Member for Derby. He did not express any astonishment on that fact. He knew perfectly well that many other articles besides that had now become fundamental articles of the Liberal creed which at that time were being denounced by the Liberal Party of the day. He did not intend to make any further remarks on that point, but he had thought it worthy of comment that this article which was now set up as essentially a part of the Liberal creed, was deliberately set aside in the legislation inaugurated by the right hon. Member for Derby. The right hon. Gentleman recognized that there were circumstances in which it was not desirable to transfer the control of the police force to a body elected by the ratepayers. That was practically what the Government suggested now. In their proposal they recognized that the police had hitherto been under the control of a body of gentlemen who, as his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) said, had performed their duties in a manner which had received the commendation of all parties in the country, and they did not think it would be right or prudent all at once, at any rate, to alter entirely that condition of things, and take away from that Body which had so effectively controlled the police in the past the powers they now possessed in order to hand them over to the new Body about to be created. The question now before the Committee was the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend that the entire control of the police should remain in the hands of the magistrates. He could quite understand his hon. and gallant Friend having that view. He found no fault with him for entertaining it or that many of his hon. Friends should agree with the hon. and gallant Baronet in his opinions. He could readily understand that there were arguments of an extremely strong character which might be used in support of the proposal of the hon. and gallant Baronet. Certainly no charge could be substantiated or even made against the administration of the police by the Quarter Sessions, but the Committee were aware that the Government were proposing to set up in the counties a Body elected by the ratepayers for the purpose of performing many of the duties within the counties which had hitherto been performed by the magistrates. The question arose then, whether having set up such a Body—a Body representative of the ratepayers, was no share to be given to them in the management and control of the police? Having set up such a Body which was to have the control of the rates, and would have practically to find the money for the payment of the police, were they to say that they were not to give to it the management of the police for which the ratepayers had to provide the money? The Government did not think it was possible for them to make such a proposal as that, and, therefore, they proposed to associate with the Quarter Sessions elected representatives of the ratepayers. In that suggestion they believed they found a solution of the question as to what should be the relative shares of the old and new Bodies in the control of the police. That being their view, and that being the proposal of the Bill, he was sorry to say to his hon. and gallant Friend that the Government were unable to accept the proposals which he made, and which would relegate entirely to the Quarter Sessions the control of the police.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said, that as he had had an opportunity of speaking upon this question before, he would not detain the Committee for more than a few moments, but he was bound to say that when his right hon. Friend, in opposing the Amendment, dwelt on the fact that the Government were going to create by this Bill a new Body to be elected by the ratepayers, and asked how it was possible to give some share in the control of the police to the new Body. Surely, if that argument were good for anything at all it was good for giving the whole control of the police to the new Body. The Committee had three proposals before them. There was the proposal of Gentlemen on the other side of the House to hand over the police to the County Councils as a Body. Then there was the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend that the control should remain as at present with the Quarter Sessions, and, thirdly, there was the proposal of the Government by which he understood they intended to sub-divide the responsibility connected with the police—for while the Chief Constable was to remain entirely under the control of the Quarter Sessions, the police themselves were to be handed over to the control of a joint committee. The proposal of the Government was that the appointment, dismissal, and control of the Chief Constable should remain with the Quarter Sessions, and his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board had informed the Committee that the Government intended to adhere to that proposal. Now, he could perfectly understand both of the first two proposals. It was a perfectly logical proposal, and, perhaps, it might be one that might work well, that the management of the police should be entrusted entirely to the County Councils. Then, again, experience had already proved that the sole control left in the hands of the Quarter Sessions might be expected to work equally well in the future as in the past; but, he did not understand the proposal of the Government to give the control of the police to a perfectly new Body, but rather to place them under the control of three distinct authorities. The Chief Constable was to be appointed by the Quarter Sessions, the police were to be paid by the County Council, and were to be managed by a joint committee. Was it reasonable to suppose that an arrangement of that kind was likely to turn out to be a practical and business-like arrangement? The right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfield) said, that he preferred of the two proposals now before the Committee, that which was suggested by the Government. Why was that? Was it on the ground that it was a business-like proposal that was likely to work well? Nothing of the kind. The right hon. Gentleman had carefully guarded himself against saying anything of the sort. He supported it on the ground of sentiment, because it was one of the new fangled articles of faith which of late years had become fashionable with the Liberal Party. For these reasons he intended to support the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend, and he hoped that he would be accompanied into the Lobby by many other hon. Members. He was bound to say that there was one other consideration which had great weight with him. When they were going to make a change of this kind they ought to be able to give some good reason for it. No Member of the House, sitting on any Bench, had as yet said anything which might lead them to believe that there was any reason to be advanced in favour of the change. No complaint had ever been made by anybody as to the manner in which the control of the police had been conducted by the Quarter Sessions up to the present time, and although that was the case, and although the Committee had definitely decided already that the control was not to be transferred to the County Councils—despite all that, it was proposed by the Government, and he confessed very greatly to his regret, to hand over the management of the police for the future to a dual control which he could not regard as anything but an unpractical and unbusiness-like proposal.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham) said, he cordially supported the Amendment which had been moved by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sussex. He could not help agreeing with a remark which fell from the hon. Member for Shoreditch (Mr. Stuart) yesterday, when he said that, having heard the speech of the right hon. Member for Halifax, he was of opinion that it was an argument in favour of the existing system. So far as he had been able to hear that speech, and it was very difficult at times to hear the speeches delivered on the Front Bench, he had arrived at a similar conclusion. The right hon. Gentleman had talked of the nature of the duties the police had to perform, and he had spoken of them in such a way as to convince him that it was undesirable to make any alteration in the management of that body which, on the whole, was admitted on all sides to have worked remarkably well. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian appeared to think that some hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House were supporting the existing system simply because it was an existing institution, and had pointed out to the House, no doubt correctly, that the system itself was not founded on constitutional usage. He submitted, however, that the question for consideration was not so much how long the system had been at work, but whether it had worked well—and he ventured to say that there was no hon. Member on the other side of the House who would be bold enough to assert—and they were not unaccustomed to the making of bold assertions—that the management of the police by the magistrates had not been, on the whole, as good as could possibly be desired. He supported the Amendment on behalf of a class of persons who were more deeply interested in the matter than any other—namely, the police themselves. He contended that if the proposal of the Government for a dual control were adopted the police would encounter great difficulties in the execution of their duties. Hitherto the police had performed those duties, arduous and difficult as they were, with patience, energy, and a scrupulous fidelity which was beyond praise. But they would be asking them to do what he maintained they had no right to ask any man to do—namely, to serve two masters. They had the highest authority for saying that it was impossible to do that. He thought that of the four courses that were open for the Commission to take the proposition of the hon. and gallant Baronet was decidedly the best; but if, unhappily, it should be beaten, he, for one, convinced as he was of the great danger which would attend dual control, would decidedly prefer that the duties should be undertaken by the Home Office. The worst course that could possibly be devised was that of the Government for subjecting the management of the police to dual control. They were asked to adopt a system and principle which not one of them would carry out in his own private affairs. Would any man employing a butcher, a baker, or a tailor, discharge any one of them who had given him perfect satisfaction in order to employ someone else of whom he knew nothing. He hoped that, in the discussion which would take place, something would be done to avert the danger which would arise from the innovation proposed by the Government.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) said, that the argument which had just been addressed to the Committee by the hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was just the argument which was always adduced against every reform proposed either from the Ministerial or the Opposition Benches. Hon. Members were invariably opposed to all progress and all change, whether in relation to home government, or the government of the Empire at large. The arguments which had been adduced were the same as those which were always used, and amounted to this—that everything which now existed was satisfactory. The hon. Gentleman opposite had not, however, taken note of the fact that the people had now a voice in the government of the country. They had already received the electoral franchise, and the Government now proposed to transfer to them the administration of their local affairs. Could it then be contended, for a moment, that the taking of the control of the police out of the hands of the County Councils would be giving them that proper administration of their own affairs which was claimed for them? The only argument which had been used in favour of letting the management of the police remain in the hands of the Quarter Sessions was that the magistrates themselves were charged with the duty of maintaining law and order. That was a fair argument as far as it went, but it was a very limited argument, and altogether unequal to the gravity of the position. He admitted that the duty of maintaining peace was in the hands of the magistrates; but hon. Members opposite spoke of the maintenance of law and order as if the 60,000 inhabitants of a town were so many enemies of order, and were and were only to be kept in subjection by the control of the magistrates and their servants, the police. He wished to point out this elementary truth, that a few magistrates and a small body of police would be absolutely impotent to preserve order unless the remaining 59,990 inhabitants were equally charged with the maintenance of order. He maintained that every honest citizen had devolved upon him just as much as a magistrate or a policeman the duty of maintaining order and peace in a community. If the bulk of the people were in reality the enemies of law and order, the work undertaken by the police it would be impossible for them to discharge. An ordinary number of policemen was about one to 1,000 of the inhabitants, and there was scarcely a rural district in England where there was not one policeman to 2,000 inhabitants. If the people were allowed to manage their affairs for themselves, they could do that with half the number of policemen who were now required. By the way in which they were now employed they contrived to make crime instead of diminishing it. They were engaged in the most trivial and unworthy occupations, and many of them were spies and game-keepers for the landed interest of the country. [Cries of "Oh!"] He spoke from a point of view from which hon. Gentlemen opposite had never observed these things. If they would lay aside their state and dignity and look at the question from the cottage point of view, instead of the palace and mansion point of view, they would be able to understand these things fairly enough. He intended to vote against the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for North-West Sussex, simply because its object was to leave the control of the police in the hands of the magistrates. The Government had already defeated a far more logical proposition that the whole matter should be handed over to the County Councils, but he should now vote with the Government, because they recognized to a limited extent the right of the ratepayers to have a voice in the matter. He looked upon it as the thin end of the wedge, and hoped to see it driven home by-and-bye.

VISCOUNT GRIMSTON (Herts, St. Alban's) said, he wished to repudiate the sentiment expressed by the hon. Member who had just sat down, and especially the accusation that the county magistrates employed the police as spies and game-keepers. He did not believe that anyone with justice could accuse the English county magistrates of having made use of the police force in the unworthy manner suggested. What was the prospect of any finality if the Government adhered to the clause as it stood? He asserted, without fear of contradiction, that, after what they had heard from the opposite side of the House, there would be no finality whatever in their proposals. The Opposition declared their intention, as soon as they possibly could, of using their utmost endeavour to secure that the police force should be placed entirely in the hands of the County Council. Therefore, they could reckon when the swing of the pendulum came round, as it inevitably would in the course of nature, and hon. Members opposite were sitting on the Ministerial side of the House, the present proposals of the Government would be brought under review, and there would be a fresh agitation on the subject. That, he thought, would be a very bad thing, and therefore he should support the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend. A short time ago he had been given to understand, by the remarks of the President of the Local Government Board, that it was intended, in appointing a joint committee, to have a sufficient number of magistrates upon it, to insure that they would practically have the chief voice in administering the affairs of the police. All he could say was, that if that was the case, the County Councils, having found out that they were in a minority and that they had no real voice in controlling the police, would commence an agitation which would certainly be detrimental to the interests of that most useful body. The police were a body enrolled for the enforcement of judicial decrees, and they ought, therefore, to be under the control of a judicial executive. There were many matters which must inevitably come before the joint committee. Take the case of the pension of a constable, who might have rendered himself unpopular by the fearless discharge of his duties; or, on the other hand, too popular by the slack manner in which he discharged them. In such a case the pension awarded to that man might be materially affected by the popularly elected character of the tribunal before which the question would have to come. There was another point which ought not to be lost sight of. Most hon. Members had been speaking to their constituents, and assuring them that they wished for equal laws, both for the Sister Island and themselves. If such a state of things were to be brought about that the County Councils would eventually have the control of the police, were they prepared to carry out that matter to its logical conclusion, and hand over the control of the police to County Councils in the Sister Island? He admitted that the police in Ireland were paid from the taxes, and were under the Crown; and he was not prepared to say it would not be the best solution of the question if they were to be placed in the same position on this side of the Channel. Be that as it might, he quite agreed with the hon. Member who said that no man could serve two masters, and in this case there were not only two masters, but three. He was afraid that the chances of the success of this part of the Bill were very small indeed, and therefore he cordially supported the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for North-West Sussex.

Viscount Grimston

MR. WIGGIN (Staffordshire. Handsworth) said, that having had considerable experience in the management of the police as a member of borough Watch Committees, and as a county magistrate, he desired to say a few words. The police force of the county of Stafford was one of the finest bodies of men in England; but although that was the case, and although it was exceedingly well managed by the county magistrates, he, for one, would be quite willing to hand over the control of the force to the County Councils. By this Bill they were creating a new Governing Body, and it was always understood that this Governing Body would have a large amount of work imposed upon it. It seemed to him, however, that this Amendment was an attempt to reduce the amount of work that was to be placed in the hands of the County Councils. It had been urged that it was desirable to secure upon the County Councils men of high standing and of business habits, who would be qualified to do work; but if they were to whittle all the duties away in this manner they would not be able to attract good and efficient men to serve on the Councils. He should be glad to do away with the dual control, and to give the entire management to the County Council; but if that could not be done, he should support the Government clause as it stood.

MR. S. HOARE (Norwich) said, that although he had the honour of being a county magistrate and of serving on the Court of Quarter Sessions, he felt that the Amendment would be a mistake in the future carrying out of the Bill. He regretted that the hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Spalding Division (Mr. Halley Stewart), should have felt it his duty to make an attack on the magistrates. Although he was one of those who neither lived in a mansion or a palace, he believed, like all the other magistrates in his district, that he endeavoured to do his duty in the best way he possibly could. The hon. Member said that the action of the police increased crime; but if he attended the Petty Sessions of the country he would find that crime was decreasing on every side. These matters, however, did not fall within the scope of the present discussion, and, therefore, he would proceed at once to explain why he opposed the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet, whose experience was so much greater than his own. He was opposed to the Amendment, because he considered that, if it were carried, it would set up a dual control, and he knew that many hon. Members were opposed to the Government clause because they thought it would introduce a dual control. Now, he, on the contrary, thought that if some such plan were not introduced there would be dual control. The County Councils would have the voting of the supplies for the police which the Quarter Sessions would administer. It was clear that the representatives of the ratepayers would not be satisfied with merely voting the money, without having some account from the Quarter Sessions of their stewardship. In that House hon. Members objected to pass Votes in regard to matters upon which they were unable to express their opinions. That would be the case of the County Councils, and whenever a vote for the police was proposed a discussion would arise which could not be satisfactory. Although there might be members of the Quarter Sessions upon the County Councils, it would not be officially represented. Therefore, he felt that a difficulty would arise, because they would have the Quarter Sessions administering the money, while the power of raising it would rest with the representatives of the ratepayers, who would have no voice whatever in the matter. Small questions, such as pensions or dismissals and others, would be continually arising, and would cause considerable bitterness between the County Councils and the Quarter Sessions. It should, therefore, be their effort to prevent the irritation which might arise from a dual control, and, in his opinion, no such irritation would arise if the management were entrusted to a joint committee as proposed by the Government. He certainly believed that if the administration of the police were left entirely in the hands of the magistrates a considerable amount of irritation would arise outside, and there would be agitation both in the market place and upon the village green, both upon little questions and great questions. He would far rather see all questions, whether of police pensions or any other matter, discussed by men of business of all shades of opinion in committee than subjected to public meetings and agitation outside. He thought the Committee ought to settle satisfactorily the question of the administration of the police, as by the plan proposed by the Government, while the ratepayers would be represented, they would have the advantage of a considerable number of the most experienced members of the Court of Quarter Sessions.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) said, the speech of his hon. Friend was rather a speech in favour of handing over the whole of the administration of the police to the County Councils, which the House by vote had already decided against, and, therefore, it was impossible to go back upon it. In supporting the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend, he did so upon rather different grounds from those which his hon. and gallant Friend and others had placed before the Committee. In reconstructing their local administration they should aim at simplicity. Yet by the Bill it was proposed that they should have, not a dual control nor a triple control, but, in fact, a quadruple control over the police. There would be a joint committee, a County Council, the Court of Quarter Sessions, and, over all, the Home Office; for if they looked at the 24th clause they would find that the power of the Home Office was far greater and more important than any of the powers given to the other three Bodies. Anyone who had had anything to do with police management in the counties knew that the power of the magistrates in Quarter Sessions over the police was very slight indeed. They exercised the privilege of appointing the Chief Constable, but as soon as they had appointed him the control over both him and the police passed out of their hands. So far as the patronage in the appointment of the Chief Constable was concerned, it would reside better in the Court of Quarter Sessions, which was composed of nominees of the Crown, the members of which were liable to be dismissed by the Lord Chancellor, than in any elected Body. He spoke from his own experience, from what he had seen, heard, and read, and from circumstances in which he had taken part, and he had no hesitation in saying that the patronage of the Court of Quarter Sessions was carefully and prudently exercised, and that it was quite free from political bias; whereas an elected committee of the County Council would never be free from political bias. All the elections they well knew would be fought on political lines, and most of the representatives of the County Councils would be elected on account of their political opinions. For these reasons he was in favour of the Amendment of his hon. Friend. The President of the Local Government Board said that the County Councils ought to have some authority over the police, because they would provide the money for their maintenance. That was not so. The police would be hereafter maintained out of the £5,000,000 of subventions, proposed to be handed over out of the taxes for the relief of the ratepayers. Therefore, that argument fell to the ground.

Mr. SWETENHAM (Carnarvon, &c.) said, he wished to explain the reasons why he intended to vote for the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Baronet. He could not help thinking that if the Government had an opportunity of seeing the different extracts from the Vernacular Press of Wales which had been sent to him, they would not have the intention they appeared to have to retain their own clause. It was impossible for any person in that House to ignore the fact that most lamentable disturbances had taken place in the Principality. There were many persons who conscientiously objected to the payment of tithe, and, at the same time, it was absolutely necessary, when they refused to pay it, that the assistance of the police should be, from time to time, called in. Remarks had been made from time to time by different speakers in the Principality as to what they would do when they got the power, and had the control of the police in their own hands. In the county which he represented, during the time the disturbances were going on, requisitions were sent to the county magistrates, calling upon them to reduce the number of police, on the ground that the county did not require so many; but, in point of fact, there were too few police constables already. Under these circumstances, he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to this fact. In Wales the chances were that a greater portion of the County Councils would be composed of gentlemen who conscientiously objected to the payment of tithes, and conscientiously objected to the employment of the police in levying tithes. They were conscientious men, and, therefore, he did not blame them for following up their principles; but, as conscientious men, they would do all they could to prevent the police from being employed on such occasions. The police, however, would be under the orders of the Chief Constable; and, supposing that the appointment of Chief Constable remained as they proposed by the Bill in the hands of Quarter Sessions, they would have the control of the police resting with the County Councils, while the Chief Constable would be under the management and control of an entirely different Body. The police would feel themselves compelled to obey the orders of the Chief Constable, and in doing so they would know that they were acting against the wishes and against the principles of the bulk of the County Councils, so that when the question of dismissal or pensions arose their interests were likely to be materially injured. For these reasons he could not help thinking that the police force ought to be entirely under the control of the Quarter Sessions. The arguments in favour of keeping the police force in the hands of that Body were absolutely overwhelming.

Question put.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, he moved to leave out all the words from "respect," in line 12, to "respect," in line 18, the effect of the Amendment being to take from the Quarter Sessions the appointment, control, and dismissal of Chief Constables.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 12, to leave out from the word "respect" to the word "to," in line 18.

Question proposed, "That the words 'to the appointment, control, and dismissal of chief constables,' stand part of the Clause."

Mr. F. S. POWELL asked, if the Amendment which he had placed on the Paper would be safeguarded in the event of this Amendment being carried?

The CHAIRMAN said, he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member would be safeguarded,

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, the Amendment standing in his name was intended to place the county police under the authority of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department. A good deal had been said in the course of the discussion about trusting the people in the matter of the police. That argument was founded on a misconception. The only persons who really trusted the people were himself and those who agreed with him; for they did not trust the people in a fragmentary way; they trusted the people, the whole people, and nothing but the people—that was to say, the people of the United Kingdom and Ireland as represented in Parliament. It was not wise, but dangerous, to trust matters of large responsibility to small sections of the people, but there was no danger whatever in trusting the people as a whole. He hoped that, instead of this sectional trust of the people, they would carry out the principle he had explained by leaving out the words which vested the powers and duties with respect to the county police in the hands of a local Council, and substitute for them the words "Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department," whom they had in that House, whom they could command and trust, and whom, if they did not trust, they could displace. In a comparatively short space of time the provisions of the Bill might be applied to Ireland. He would like to know whether any Member of that House would be willing to place the police of Ireland under local popular control? The people of London were as intelligent as any people, and yet it was not deemed safe that they should have the control of their own police. There was an absurdity in placing the responsibility for the prevention of crime in the hands of 120 different establishments; the prevention of crime was an Imperial duty which extended to the whole country. If a protected Prime Minister were to travel from London to Edinburgh with the ordinary stoppages for making speeches, he would come under the surveillance of a dozen different police forces. He would like to support what he said by the statements of the Royal Commissioners when the Constabulary was first founded in 1839. They said that by separate and independent management in counties there must be expense, trouble, and inconvenience, such as had been attendant upon the old system of management by parish constables. The old system of elective constables had one supporter in the House—namely, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who seemed to think that the ancient and barbarous methods of maintaining law and order should be still adhered to. The Commissioners also stated that separate local police establishments would be inadequate, inefficient, and very expensive. The time had now arrived when a great step in advance might be made by establishing one Imperial force. The Commissioners summed up their objections to the present system by saying that with 52 different forces there would be 52 conflicting modes of action, and that any measure which did not tend to the establishment of one force and one system throughout the country would end in comparative inefficiency, greater expense, and the creation of local animosities. His proposal, therefore, was to enlarge the powers of the Home Office, and to get rid of the mischiefs which were pointed out in this most valuable Report of the Commissioners. Hon. Gentlemen on these Benches were desirous of efficiency and anxious for economy; but he was bound to say that the method of administration proposed by the Government in this Bill made efficiency and economy quite impossible. Having, he believed, said sufficient to recommend his Amendment to the Committee, he had only to point out that there was a precedent for this proposal in the case of the prisons, which had been placed successfully under Government control 12 years ago.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 20, after the words "attach to," to leave out all the words to end of Clause, and insert "Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department."—(Mr. Stanley Leighton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. RITCHIE said, he was very far indeed from saying that there was not a good deal to be urged in favour of the proposal of his hon. Friend; but, looking at the discussion which had already taken place with reference to the control of the police, he thought his hon. Friend would hardly expect that the Government would recede from the position they had taken up in that respect. He thought it would also be seen that the Committee, having come to a conclusion adverse to placing the police under the control of the Judicial Body under which they now were, was hardly likely to accept the proposal of his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend would understand that he did not propose to trouble the Committee again with the various arguments which had been advanced on this subject during the discussion that had taken place, and he would only say, further, that the Government were unable to accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) said, he rose to oppose the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Oswestry Division of Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton), whom he would congratulate upon the extreme frankness of his statement. He was not, however, able to congratulate him so much upon his remarks in reference to the control of the police. He (Mr. Cunninghame Graham) would point out that there were two places in the country, and two only, where the police were in collision with the people—namely, Ireland and the Metropolis, and in those places the police were under the direct control of the Crown. He thought that the duty of answering the hon. Gentleman devolved upon the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary rather than on himself; but, as he was on friendly terms with the right hon. Gentleman, he wished to protest emphatically against another unpleasant duty being placed upon him. He might also suggest that if the hon. Gentleman did not feel it right to vote for the alternative system he should place the police under the control of the Emperor of Japan.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) said, that outside London there were parts of counties extending 15 miles from Charing Cross where the police were under the control of the Home Secretary. He did not see why the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board should not apply to the counties outside London, and it was his intention to move an Amendment with that object.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, the Division which had taken place not only had the effect of knocking the Government out of time, but also of knocking the sense out of the clause. With regard to the Amendment before the Committee, the hon. Member had placed before them a proposal which might be worthy of the consideration of the Committee; but considering that, as had been pointed out more than once in the discussion, the action of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had been to bring the people of the Metropolis into collision with the police, he thought the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman opposite would be the very last thing which it would be their duty to entertain. The hon. Gentleman, he wished to point out, was exceedingly illogical in some of the remarks he had made, and he thought he must have been guilty of an unconscious joke levelled at the Members of the Government on the Treasury Benches. But when the hon. Gentleman said that it was dangerous to trust large matters to small portions of the people, and then said he was in favour of placing the control of the police under that fragment of the people, which consisted of the Home Office and himself, it seemed to him that his arguments became very illogical indeed. He believed the hon. Member was in favour of retaining the control of the police in the hands of the magistrates, and there again he would point out that when he spoke of trusting the whole people, and nothing but the people, he either did not understand what the people meant, or he was so illogical that he did not know whither his remarks were carrying him; because the magistrates belonged to one class, and certainly did not constitute the people as a whole. He thought it would be agreed that the landocracy constituted a very small portion of the people; and, therefore, if the hon. Gentleman was sincere in his wish to retain the police under the control of the magistrates, he could not be sincere in his wish to see any of these powers left in the hands of the people. The hon. Gentleman had explained that the people of London were the most intelligent in the country. He did not intend to dispute a proposition of that kind; but when the hon. Gentleman went on to say that the people of London had no control over their police, and used that argument as a reason why the Home Office should control the police in all other parts of the country, he (Mr. Conybeare) must point out again that the hon. Member was also illogical here, because he had expressed the opinion that, in large matters, not a small portion of the people, but the whole, should be trusted. He did not suppose that the hon. Gentleman would be very successful if he carried his Amendment to a Division; and, after the expression of opinion on the Treasury Bench, he thought he would be wise in withdrawing it.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) said, he was one of those who desired to see progress made in this measure; and, therefore, because he deprecated unnecessary Divisions, he would express his hope that his hon. Friend (Mr. Stanley Leighton) would withdraw his Amendment.

Mr. Cunninghame Graham

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he wished to point out that the argument in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Oswestry Division of Shropshire was that it would increase economy and efficiency. It was obvious that by having one control there must be a saving of expenditure in respect of correspondence, clerks, and other matters. If they followed the example in the case of the prisons they would have one central authority, one control, and one set of regulations for one force, and this would certainly produce greater efficiency all round.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley) said, the Amendment standing in his name would have the effect of preserving the present useful arrangements existing between some of the boroughs and counties which had worked very satisfactorily, and which he thought it was undesirable to disturb.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 23, at end of Clause, to add the words—"All arguments under which the police of any county and borough are consolidated, or under which any borough is watched by county police, shall, notwithstanding anything in this Act, remain in force and be carried into effect until lawfully determined, the standing joint committee only being substituted so far as requisite for the justices of the county."—(Mr. Woodall.)

MR. RITCHIE said, he was in accord with what he believed to be the object of this Amendment; but he would point out that if the Government were to accept it as it stood, it would practically prejudice certain questions with reference to the boroughs and counties. He would undertake that, as far as boroughs of over 10,000 in population were concerned, they accepted the spirit of the hon. Member's proposal. But he thought it better that what had to be said on the question should be deferred until they came to the clause dealing with the question.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) asked if there would be an opportunity of discussing the question of police with regard to boroughs under 10,000; because, if he allowed the present opportunity to pass, those who wished to raise that question might be ruled out of Order hereafter.

MR. RITCHIE said, there would be nothing whatever to prejudice the discussion by accepting his proposal to defer the question.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE said, there was in his borough a very strong feeling that the municipal authorities should have the control of their own police, although the borough did not contain 10,000 inhabitants. He did not wish to delay the progress of the Bill, and as he understood that he should not be out of Order in raising the subject hereafter he was willing to accede to the request of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. WOODALL said, he was exceedingly desirous of falling in with the views of the right hon. Gentleman. He wished to facilitate the passage of the Bill; and, on the understanding that boroughs of under 10,000 inhabitants should not be prejudiced by the postponement, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. FIRTH said, he would point out that the control of the police by the Home Office extended from Chislehurst on one side of London to Uxbridge on the other. He would not go into the historic reasons why it should come to pass that the control of the Home Secretary extended to counties outside London; but he ventured to suggest that those counties were just as well able to control their police as those to whom it was proposed to give powers under this clause. He would, therefore, move an Amendment to include the principle he had in view in the Bill.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 23, at end of Clause, to add the words—"This section shall apply to all counties and boroughs of counties outside the county of London in respect of the control of the police."—(Mr. Firth.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. RITCHIE said, he could not accept the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and would make a suggestion that it should be withdrawn and the discussion of the point deferred. They must deal with the London police district as a whole.

MR. FIRTH said, on the understanding that the question of London police control would be considered hereafter on its merits, he would not press his Amendment.

MR. RITCHIE said, he believed that the Committee would always consider a case upon its merits.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RITCHIE said, with reference to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) with reference to the powers of Quarter Sessions, under Clause 7 of the County and Borough Police Act of 1856, he had prepared an Amendment which he wished to submit to the Committee whereby the power of imposing certain additional duties on the police, as vested by the section referred to in Quarter Sessions, should be exercisable by Quarter Sessions as well as by the joint committee and also by the County Councils.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 23, at end of Clause, to add —“Provided that the powers conferred by section seven of the County and Borough Police Act, 1856, which requires constables to perform, in addition to their ordinary duties, such duties connected with the police as the Quarter Sessions may direct or require, shall continue to be exercised by the Quarter Sessions as well as by the constituted joint committee, and may also be exercised by the County Council, and the said section shall be construed as if the County Council and the constituted joint committee were therein mentioned as well as the Quarter Sessions.”—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question, “That those words be there added,” put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Transfer to County Council of power of certain Government Departments and other Authorities).

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said, the clause as it stood transferred to the local Councils powers which were vested at present in certain Bodies, such as the Treasury, the Local Government Board, and the Board of Trade. The object of his Amendment was, instead of transferring these powers by the Bill, to enable them hereafter to be transferred by Order in Council. His reason for moving the Amendment was that would be unwise to load the new authorities with all these onerous duties at starting. [Laughter.] He saw no reason for laughter. He confessed that until he had some experience of the working of the County Councils, and until he knew how they were composed, he did not think it would be expedient to vest in them a large number of powers. His view was that the County Councils should be made perfectly impartial and homogeneous, and in future, when they were able to judge how their business had been conducted, they might transfer to them any further powers which they considered could be rightly transferred. The transfer of these powers he proposed, as he had said, to be made in future by Order in Council; beyond that he could not at present go. He might point out that some of the powers to be transferred were quite unnecessary. Hon. Members would find by the Schedule that, among others, it was proposed to transfer the power now vested in the Board of Trade of making piers and harbours, and if they adopted the clause as it stood they would be conferring on the County Council of Rutland, for instance, the most unnecessary power of carrying out those works. He thought the Committee would agree with him that this Amendment was well deserving of consideration, and, as far as he was concerned, he greatly preferred his proposal to the clause in its present form.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 24, leave out “On and after the appointed day,” and insert “It shall be lawful for Her Majesty the Queen in Council, if satisfied of such approval as hereinafter mentioned from time to time, by order to transfer to the Council of a county all or any of.”—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY (Lancashire, N., Blackpool) said, he should support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. Although, at first sight, undoubtedly, it had the appearance of emasculating the Bill, he would point out, with reference to the constitution of County Councils, the Bill had already been eviscerated by the exclusion of some of the smaller boroughs from the County Councils. That exclusion might be a good thing, but the constitution of the County Councils had thus become very different from what it was originally, inasmuch as they would be composed entirely of rural members or members from very small boroughs. He was not prepared to say there were not some powers of Government Departments that could not be very well given to the County Councils, but he thought, rather than run any risk, they should say that these large functions should not now be specified. He thought that before they were transferred it was desirable to see how the Councils discharged the less important duties. As a matter of practical experience, and apart from Party politics, he thought it was safer to keep powers with constituted authorities like the Board of Trade or the Local Government Board, having a staff of officers for dealing with the various subjects, than it would be to give them to the County Councils. If hon. Members would look at some of the powers now exercised by the Local Government Board and the Board of Trade and the powers proposed to be transferred to the County Councils; if they would consider the amount of machinery necessary to carry out these powers, he thought they would see that it was impossible for the County Councils to deal with them. There were many counties which would have to decide on the question of piers and harbours. It was not stated that the country would be able to dispense with any of the Board of Trade officers in consequence of the proposed transfer, and he asserted that the Board of Trade, by their local inquiries, which were conducted at a small cost, had satisfied local demands. The proposal in the Bill was—for instance, where a borough desired gas or water works—instead of coming to a large constituted authority such as the Board of Trade they should go to the County Council, on which probably they thought they were inadequately represented, and where not only would the question be decided on its merits, but with considerable opposition on the part of rival boroughs. He knew that in Lancashire there were districts in which this would occur, and he could not conceive that any advantage would be derived from the action of County Councils in these matters. He pointed out also that there must be great expense in providing the County Councils with all the machinery necessary to deal with the powers proposed to be conferred upon them as they arose. He did not say that there were not some smaller matters which might be transferred to the County Councils. Nor did he wish to deprive them of the position they ought to occupy; but he would point out that it was proposed to transfer the powers of dealing with gas and water and the management of tramways throughout the Kingdom, which were matters requiring exhaustive inquiry, and then Provisional Orders followed by a Bill in Parliament. That being so, he asked hon. Members whether they thought the County Councils competent to deal with all these subjects? Not only was the change proposed a very sweeping one in itself; but, although the rates would be enormously increased, he did not think the districts would get value for the money spent. On the whole, he believed there would be great dissatisfaction if the clause were carried in its present form. It was because he wished the system to be a success that he was anxious not to overburden the new Bodies, and he should therefore support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire. He did not think hon. Members would deem it wise to give to the small boroughs the government powers which were enumerated. The case might be argued at greater length; but he thought he had given some reason why the Government should hesitate before they gave these powers to the County Council. He believed that in supporting the Amendment they would be doing mischief to the Councils and no good to the boroughs. His opinion was that they ought to shrink from giving powers to the new Bodies which could not be exercised for the good of the community.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.) said, he quite agreed with the hon. Baronet (Sir Matthew White Ridley) that there were certain powers which the Local Government Board and the Board of Trade possessed that it would be desirable at once to give to the County Council, small powers which did not require great skill to exercise. But there were some powers of such great magnitude—for instance, there was the one to which he drew the attention of the House some time ago, that concerning the public health of the country, and which at the present moment was carried into successful operation by the skilled staff of the Local Government Board—which ought not to be transferred to the new authorities till they were organized and ready to use them with advantage to the nation. According to the Bill, they were at once to transfer the powers which had worked through the agency of a skilled staff of medical officers of the Local Government Board to detached and uncombined medical officers, some of whom had no training at all for the purposes contemplated, and many of whom were engaged in private practice, and had never had the opportunity or the inclination to study sanitary questions. He thought, therefore, that unless the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board assured them that he intended afterwards to put down Amendments—in regard to which he had given no Notice at the present time—giving such power to the County Councils as would enable them to get properly qualified medical men to look after the health of the community, the Bill would produce great deterioration instead of improvement in the public health. Until he knew that the right hon. Gentleman intended to make such Amendments, he should support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin).

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, he desired to corroborate what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair) with reference to medical officers. He had occasion, in former years, to take an interest in the provisions introduced into the present Statute respecting medical officers, and he was quite certain that if the public health of the future under this Bill or any other Bill was to be conducted and attended to in a satisfactory manner, great pains must be taken to keep up the dignity and to maintain the status of medical officers. He did not desire to anticipate any discussion which might arise when they came to the part of the Bill dealing more specifically with public health; but as the point had been raised by the right hon. Gentleman he could not remain entirely silent. He did not think they need have any apprehension as to some, at least, of the powers which it was proposed to transfer. The powers of the Home Office, which it was proposed to transfer to the County Councils, were confined to two subjects not entirely germane. In fact, they were connected together by a somewhat remarkable alliance in the Schedule—they were burials and fairs. In reference to the powers of the Local Government Board which it was proposed to transfer, he hoped that some of them would be removed in the subsequent discussion on the Bill. He thought it would be a misfortune to start this Bill without the transference of some powers. If the new authorities to be set up under the Bill were to be manned by men of position and character in the counties, the Committee must give them real and substantial work to do, and he doubted very much whether they could find any means of giving work to that class so effectual as by entrusting the County Council with some portion of the powers now administered by Government offices. He did not know that the removal of certain boroughs had so much weakened the County Councils as some hon. Members seemed to think. It was a grave misfortune in our social life that those who had interest in boroughs very often—in fact, almost invariably—lived outside of those boroughs. He believed that men of standing and of influence in the different boroughs would be found to reside outside of those boroughs, and to have large interest in the county. They would become efficient members of the new County Council. He, therefore, did not attach the importance some hon. Members did to the deteriorating effect upon the County Councils produced by the creation of the county boroughs; but he confessed that he was somewhat surprised to hear the criticism which had been offered by hon. Members who appeared more peculiarly to represent rural districts. He thought he had heard many hon. Gentlemen, whose interests were more rural than his own could claim to be, express great fear that the County Councils would be overborne and governed by the towns. That fear had been removed by the Amendment introduced in the Bill for the creation of a larger number of county boroughs, and he thought that on that ground, at least, they might feel more confident in entrusting powers to the County Councils.

Sir Lyon Playfair

MR. A. H. BROWN (Shropshire, Wellington) said, he desired to say a word or two from the point of view of the public health. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) proposed to transfer from his own Department to the County Councils a large number of powers which were always intended to be used in the promotion of the public health of the country. Among those powers to be transferred were the powers under certain sections named in the Public Health Act of 1875, and he desired to draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to some of the powers he was about to transfer from his Department to the County Councils. He thought that it was possible to transfer some powers to the County Councils; but it was desirable the right hon. Gentleman should retain in his Department power to control the County Council, or any other Body to whom powers were entrusted, to carry out the provisions of the law which were necessary for the improvement of the public health. One hon. Gentleman had remarked that it was proposed to transfer to the County Councils all power under the 299th section of the Act of 1875. That section was the one which compelled the authorities to perform their duties with regard to the public health, the power being vested in the Local Government Board under that section. Let him point out, however, that if, under the Bill, the powers given by that section were transferred to the County Councils, no authority in the country could be compelled by the Local Government Board to do anything that was necessary for the public health. He hoped that the point would be carefully considered, and that though the County Councils would be invested with some of the powers named in the Schedule, the Government Department would also possess the powers now named in the Act of 1875. The Local Government Board ought to be able compel the Local Authority to provide a mortuary, for instance; and they ought to be able to compel them to scavenge their streets. Those were important powers, but if the Bill passed as it now stood, there would be no power whatever on the part of the Local Government Board to compel any Local Authority to perform these important functions. He also desired to insist upon the point that there ought to be some supervising authority to see that duties were properly performed in the interests of public health. He should certainly support the Amendment now under consideration.

MR. CRAIG SELLAR (Lanarkshire, Partick) said, he listened with great pleasure to the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Blackpool Division of Lancashire (Sir Matthew White Ridley) upon the subject, to which he (Mr. Craig Sellar) had given some attention. He understood from the hon. Baronet that his argument was that, while he did not object to the transference of minor powers to the County Councils, he did object to the transference of the greater powers it was proposed to transfer. He (Mr. Craig Sellar) entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman in this matter; the hon. Gentleman adduced some very cogent reasons for his argument, which he hoped the Committee would consider carefully; but, in addition to the argument which the hon. Gentleman had urged, he desired to urge one, a minor argument certainly, but still a practical one. It was this—that the whole question of these Provisional Orders, as well as the greater questions connected with Private Bill legislation, were now being carefully considered by an important Committee of the two Houses of Parliament. That Committee would report, he hoped, very shortly, and he thought that was a strong reason for at least postponing the consideration of this clause. He trusted that if the Committee would not consent to accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), they would, at least, consent to postpone this clause until the Committee which he had mentioned had reported.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said, he did not think that anyone would accuse him of being desirous of weakening either the duties, the powers, or the responsibilities of the new Councils, and it was because he entirely agreed with the views expressed by his right hon. Friend the Member for South Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair) that he should support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin). They had been arguing all the way through—certainly, they upon the Opposition Benches had been so arguing—that it was desirable, as far as possible, to assimilate the new Council to the old Municipal Council. Now, Municipal Town Councils had had experience of Local Government for upwards of half-a-century, but Parliament had never yet proposed to confer on them the discretion and authority of the Home Secretary, or of the Local Government Board, or of the Board of Trade, in respect to the matters specified in the Schedule. It was proposed to invest the new Body—he had great faith in the new Body, although it was certainly untried and inexperienced—with these great Ministerial powers, he might almost say Parliamentary powers. He tried to follow his right hon. Friend in reference to the position of what were to be called county boroughs under the Bill. He believed the right hon. Gentleman proposed that they should still be subject to the Local Government Board, and to the Board of Trade, and to the Home Secretary, in all these matters. He quite agreed in that view, at all events for the present; but he thought that to invest the County Councils and not the municipal boroughs with these various discretionary powers, all of which would require a large and expensive and experienced staff in order to carry them out efficiently, was really proceeding on wrong lines. He thought that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division went as far as they ought to go. So far as Section 1 was concerned, he was quite willing that the Government of the day, having full knowledge of the facts of the case, should have power, by Order in Council, to transfer certain powers to the County Councils. If they did not accept the Amendment, they would be in the position that, when they came to the Schedule, they would have to discuss item by item all the things that ought to be transferred. The discussion would occupy a great deal of time, and he thought that, in the end, the County Councils would not possess a great many powers they ought to possess, and that they would possess some which they could never exercise with advantage to themselves or to the community.

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not see any great objection to accepting the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin). There would certainly, in accepting the Amendment, be the advantage alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler)—the Committee would be spared a long and very technical and intricate discussion with reference to the provisions in the Schedule of the Bill. It was certainly true also that the proposal placed on the responsible Government of the day the duty of considering, item by item, whether or not some of the powers now possessed by the various Government Departments might not safely be transferred to the County Councils. He would like, while saying that much, to say a word or two as to what he thought was a misconception which existed in the minds of some hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who had spoken. His hon. Friend (Sir Matthew White Ridley) seemed to think that, under the provisions of the Bill, the power would be transferred to the County Councils and the Councils of those boroughs which appeared in the Schedule to execute certain works such as harbours, and he thought his right hon. Friend said various other works. Let him point out that, so far as a county was concerned, and so far as all the boroughs specified in the Schedule were concerned, no power whatever with reference to any proposal for erecting works within their own area and which they would promote would be transferred to them by the Bill. Both with reference to counties and also with reference to boroughs in the 4th Schedule all Provisional Orders which were required for the purpose of executing work which they, as a Council, promoted, would have to be obtained from the Government Department as they were now obtained. It was perfectly clear, therefore, that whatever powers it might be proposed to confer on County Councils with reference to schemes proposed by Companies within their area, or by District Councils within their area, or by any other Body—it was perfectly clear that schemes of that kind were on a totally different footing to schemes of which the County Councils themselves were the promoters. While it might be perfectly right and proper to give these powers with reference to schemes promoted by authorities within the area of a County Council, it would not be right or proper that the County Councils should have the power of issuing Provisional Orders for schemes of which they themselves were the promoters. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair) alluded to a question affecting the health of the country.

Mr. Henry H. Fowler

He (Mr. Ritchie) need hardly say he should be the last man in the House to propose anything which he thought would be disadvantageous to the general health of the community, and no one recognized more than he did the immense services which had been performed by the medical officers of the Local Government Board. Allusion had been made by some hon. and right hon. Gentlemen to the fact that representations had been made to the Local Government Board from boroughs to the effect that they would very much prefer to remain under the control of the Local Government Board than to have power exercised over them in this respect by a County Council. He was perfectly aware of that feeling. He was, he confessed, not aware it existed to such an extent that he was convinced now it did, for previously to the introduction of that Bill he had read of objections which had been again and again raised as to what was sometimes called the arbitrary exercise of the powers of the Government Department. There could be no question that, at any rate at some period or other, this feeling did exist to a very considerable extent; but he had become convinced now that that feeling had been replaced almost by feelings of regard and even of affection on the part of boroughs for the Board over which he had the honour to preside. Of course, the Committee knew perfectly well what the object of the Government was in making this proposal. Their object was that a system of decentralization which had been so often called for should be established. They thought that, at any rate so far as many of the powers they proposed to transfer were concerned, they might be fairly handed over to a large representative Body, such as they hoped the County Councils would be, who would probably be better judges than a Central Department of the wishes and wants and requirements of the localities under their jurisdiction. He was now convinced that the boroughs at any rate, and also many other Bodies in the counties, had such a complete confidence in the way in which the Local Government Board administered the powers which were conferred upon it, that they preferred that the Board should have the administration and control, rather than that it should be handed over to the County Councils—they would rather bear the ills they had than fly to those they knew not of. He was glad this was so, because he thought it was a very great indication that in recent years, at any rate, the powers which had been wielded by Government Departments had been exercised wisely and to the public advantage. That indication was fairly given through the representations which had been made on the part of boroughs, and it had to some extent reconciled him to a proposal which he could not help saying was in some measure a weakening of the Bill the Government had introduced. But he did not understand that the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) was proposed in that sense—it was rather that what was to be done should be done tentatively, and that full consideration should be given by the Government of the day to every one of the proposed transferences before it was made. It was in this spirit they accepted the Amendment of his right hon. Friend. The acceptance of the Amendment would certainly have the great advantage which had been pointed out, that the Committee would be spared a long and intricate and technical discussion with reference to the different powers specified in the Schedule. He therefore proposed, on the part of the Government, to accept the Amendment of his right hon. Friend.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) said, he wished to understand how far this Amendment would go. Did the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) understand that the Amendment would apply to the County of London and its Council? The County of London stood in an entirely different position to other counties in the country, and he was bound to say that, so far as London was concerned, this Amendment would be most mischievous in its operation. He had regard particularly to the powers of the Home Office, and he presumed that if this Amendment were carried, those powers would be retained by the Home Secretary. That was not the desire of the ratepayers and citizens of the Metropolis. These proceedings seemed to him to show the absurdity of trying to treat London as if it were on all-fours with the other counties which were dealt with in the Bill. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would consider this point, and make a statement in reference to it when they came to the London clauses.

MR. RITCHIE said, that, so far as he understood the Amendment of his right hon. Friend, it merely provided that the transference of these powers should take place by means of an Order in Council. It was quite evident that if London could not be considered separately, as he thought it could, power would remain to the Government of the day to make transferences which hon. Gentlemen thought it would be advisable to make. With reference to London, the Government had always had in their minds that when they came to the clauses dealing with the Metropolis separate and full consideration should be given to the peculiarities of the position occupied by London.

MR. LAWSON said, that the fact that the powers could be transferred by Order in Council was no guarantee to hon. Members. They found the Home Office extremely unwilling to surrender its prerogatives; and what they wanted to get was an absolute assurance on the point. When they came to the London clauses they would certainly press the right hon. Gentleman in respect to this matter.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) said, that it appeared to him that this was a clause requiring very careful consideration and treatment, and he was rather sorry the right hon. Gentleman had come to the conclusion to throw overboard entirely the 1st sub-section, and practically to retain only the 2nd.

MR. RITCHIE: No.

MR. STANSFELD said, he wanted to be quite sure he did not misunderstand the right hon. Gentleman. He understood the right hon. Gentleman accepted the principle of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division (Mr. Chaplin). What the right hon. Gentleman proposed was to transfer no powers from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, or from the Board of Trade, or from the Local Government Board, by the operation of this section, but to take power to the Government of the time being to transfer no powers from these and other Departments to the County Councils on the responsibility of the Government of the day. Did he rightly understand the matter? [MR. RITCHIE assented.] Then, practically speaking, he was right in saying the right hon. Gentleman dispensed with the first part of the section, which transferred powers by virtue of the section itself, and he preferred to rely on the 2nd sub-section, which dealt with the transference of power by Order in Council. He (Mr. Stansfeld) regretted the action of the right hon. Gentleman. He knew the right hon. Gentleman had had reason to modify the proposed provision in the Bill for the transference of powers. He was aware that a deputation of boroughs waited upon the right hon. Gentleman, and he was aware of the impression which that deputation produced upon the right hon. Gentleman's mind; and, therefore, he expected that the right hon. Gentleman would have himself proposed to reconsider this Schedule, and to have brought forward an amended Schedule at some future time, containing powers which, on more mature consideration, he thought it advisable to transfer. He understood, on the contrary, that the right hon. Gentleman elected to give up that opportunity, and preferred to leave the transference of powers entirely to future action. Then they came to the question of method. He (Mr. Stansfeld) had an Amendment to the 2nd sub-section, and perhaps he might be allowed to state his objection to that sub-section. He could quite understand a proposal that by agreement between the Government of the day and the Department concerned the transference of powers should be done by Provisional Orders involving the necessity of a confirming Bill, so that the matter might be certain of arresting the attention of Parliament; but that was not the proposal of this clause. The proposal of the clause was that a scheme when originated should lie on the Table for 30 days, and that, if it was not objected to, it should practically become law—that the Order in Council should issue as a matter of course forthwith, and that there should be no appeal to Parliament. It must be perfectly well known to Members of the Committee that, in the first place, such a scheme might lie on the Table and arrest no attention; and that, secondly, the scheme might arrest attention, but that hon. Members might be unable to get any opportunity of discussing it. This difficulty was much larger under the new Rules than under the old, and he regretted to say that there was no guarantee, under the 2nd sub-section as it stood, that the Government of the day might not on their own motion put schemes on the Table for the transference of powers from any Secretary of State, or from the Board of Trade, or the Local Government Board, or the Education Department, or from any other authority having powers within a county, and there was no guarantee that the powers might not be transferred without Parliament having an opportunity of discussing them. By adopting this Amendment the House would wash its hands of the whole business; it would relinquish all authority and power, for it would delegate its authority practically to the Government of the time being, and he was bound to say that that was a delegation and abandonment of responsibility and power which the House ought not to contemplate.

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not want to detain the Committee unnecessarily; but, of course, these were matters, and there were many other matters in connection with a great Bill like this, in regard to which there might be large and perfectly legitimate differences of opinion. The Government had made proposals which they thought were the best under the circumstances. When matters of this kind came to be discussed in a business-like way, and when a desire was shown on the part of all persons in the House to make the Bill as workable and as good a Bill as possible, he should be sorry, on the part of the Government, to attempt to set up a reputation for infallibility as to the proposals they made. The Government were perfectly willing to consider all suggestions, especially when they were made by so experienced a Member of the House as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld). Although they had provided that certain transfers might be made by means which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to—namely, the laying of the schemes on the Table of the House for a certain number of days, he was perfectly willing to fall in with the suggestion the right hon. Gentleman had made, and provide that the transference of powers should be made by a Provisional Order. He did not see the slightest objection to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, and he was anxious to say so frankly, and at once.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley) said; he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would not consider he was wasting the time of the Committee if he made clear the altered position of affairs. He (Mr. Woodall) was not quite clear what was to be the position under the altered circumstances of the boroughs in the Schedule and of the boroughs which were not included in the Schedule. Would such powers as were proposed to be given by Order in Council to the new County Authorities be also conceded to boroughs with a population of 50,000?

MR. RITCHIE said, he had endeavoured to express broadly what they conceived to be the position of things with reference to the counties, and also with reference to the boroughs which were to be treated as counties. It was quite clear that schemes promoted by Governing Bodies of boroughs and counties should not be brought into effect by means of Provisional Orders issued by the Governing Bodies themselves. It was quite clear that if a borough in the Schedule desired to promote a scheme within its own area, it would not be right or proper it should have the power to issue the Provisional Order, the borough being, as it would be, an interested party.

MR. WOODALL said, he thought it was perfectly clear that if a County Authority or a borough of 50,000 inhabitants promoted any particular measure, it must come, as at present, to Whitehall. He hoped it would not be irregular in him to refer to the Amendment of which he had given Notice, and in which he asked that whatever might be the powers of the new County Authorities, the municipal boroughs might be left, as at present, the right of appeal to the Central Authority. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had very truly said that there was a time when the relations between boroughs and the Central Authority involved a certain amount of friction. Happily, the experience of years which had brought the best minds of the Provinces into harmonious relations with the very competent central office had insured a continuous and wise policy, which had been found to work very satisfactorily, and that, at any rate, they hoped would not be disturbed by any changes the right hon. Gentleman brought about, especially in regard to Provisional Orders. Suppose a borough of a less population than 50,000 was left to appeal to the new County Authorities. What possible assurance could it have, after a decision had been arrived at, that the Bill would obtain Parliamentary assent? There was no assurance at all that the policy of the County Authority in Staffordshire would be at all akin to that which would find favour in Dorsetshire, and, therefore, they could hardly expect a Government Authority to make itself responsible for the assent to these Provisional Orders. He and his hon. Friends felt strongly there was a probability of great inconvenience and great conflict arising, and, therefore, they hoped the existing system would be continued. Whatever concessions the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to make to the County Authorities in deference to the views so forcibly expressed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Blackpool (Sir Matthew White Ridley) and others who had spoken, he trusted that those for whom he pleaded would be exempted from the operation of the concession.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, that the position of some boroughs was very peculiar. The population of Great Grimsby, which he had the honour to represent, was 53,000. It ran over the borders of the borough into various hamlets all round, the population within the borough itself being 35,000. It appeared to him that under this Bill, even with the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin), any transference of authority from the Local Government Board would enable the County Council to administer the various matters delegated to them in connection with Great Grimsby, whilst they would really know nothing about them. He, therefore, hoped that with regard to Great Grimsby, or any other borough in the same position, the right hon. Gentleman would consider whether it could not be left entirely under the Local Government Board, in the same manner as the boroughs in the 4th Schedule.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) said, he did not quite understand the position at which they had arrived. It seemed to him that instead of the Government having made a simple concession they had revolutionized the position. The proceeding of the Government had taken him quite by surprise. He and his hon. Friends were expecting that the powers specified in the 1st Schedule would positively belong to the County Councils, but in a moment the Government retreated from its position. The Government now reserved to themselves the authority to transfer these powers, and no guarantee whatever was given that any one of the powers would eventually be given to the County Councils. He heartily supported the appeal made by hon. Gentlemen around him, that they should have some opportunity of considering this question. He did not desire to move to report Progress; he would not do anything unfriendly to the Government, but he thought they ought to have time to consider the question. The Government were really emasculating the Bill; they were now taking away all its strength, saying that the House must trust the Government of the day and its wisdom and its propositions. That might be wise in itself, but the change made was so enormous that hon. Members had a right to ask for time to consider the matter.

MR. RITCHIE said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Halley Stewart) said this was an enormous change. What did the change consist of? That, instead of transferring at once by an enactment in the Bill all these powers to the County Councils, they had yielded to the argument used not on one but on both sides of the House that it would be advisable, while taking the power to make all these transfers, that the transfers should not take place at once. That practically amounted to all his right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) proposed. That proposal had been suggested by Gentlemen of very large experience in the government of counties and of boroughs. The Government thought the appeal made to them on this occasion was one of a reasonable character, and one which could not be fairly resisted. The only alteration made was that, instead of its being enacted in the Bill that these powers should be transferred, they should be transferred by Orders in Council.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) said, he thought the Government ought to understand that there were hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House who were wholly opposed to the Amendment, and stood distinctly by the principle of handing over these powers definitely by Statute. There was an Amendment on the Paper in the name of the right hon. Member for Halifax, to strike out Sub-section 2 of the clause. Now he was prepared to support that Amendment precisely on the ground that they thought the transfer of these important and drastic powers under various Acts to the County Councils, should only be done after fair and full discussion in the House. It might take a long time to discuss the Schedule; but he and his hon. Friends preferred to sit several weeks longer, if necessary, to carry out the only sound principle that these matters should be dealt with by discussion in Parliament, and not left to the Government to hand over or not.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) said, he was afraid that in the face of the great difference of opinion with regard to the clause, they were in some danger of losing the clause altogether. There was no doubt that this was an Amendment which might postpone indefinitely the transference of these powers to the County Councils, but he confessed he should not be disposed to oppose the Amendment if the Government would give them some assurance that they would not go further than this in the direction of emasculating the clause. He felt some fear on the subject because this was only the first of a series of Amendments standing in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), and though this discussion had been of a very general character, and though many hon. Members on both sides of the House had directed their attacks against other portions of the clause, the Committee had not yet heard one word from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in defence of the other provisions of the clause. He desired to point out to the Committee, with regard to the most important powers which were proposed to be transferred under the clause—the Provisional Order powers at present exercised by the Board of Trade, that it was extremely desirable that they, at any rate, should be transferred either now, or at some near time, to the Bodies which were about to be created in the counties. This measure, they had been told, was to be one of considerable decentralization. He confessed he thought that if this clause were removed from it, it would become a measure of mere transfer, and not of decentralization at all. He did think they ought not to lose that great opportunity of securing that some of these powers which at present over-burdened the Central Departments and occupied the time of Parliament should be conferred on the Local Bodies they were now about to create. He wished to draw attention to the fact that the Government were already committed in this matter. Last Session they passed an Allotments Bill, and in that Bill was contained a provision for conferring on the new County Councils, as soon as ever they were created, powers which far transcended in importance many of the powers which were contained under this clause now under discussion. Under the Allotments Act the County Authority, as soon as it was created, might exercise the power of making the purchase of land compulsory in place of the Local Government Board, who exercised it at present. Now, none of the provisions—he thought he was right in this—in Part 2 of the Schedule of this Bill would give the County Councils power to take land compulsorily. Take, for instance, the Provisional Orders under the Tramways Act. There were most careful safeguards against any abuse of the powers of the Board of Trade at present, and all those safeguards would still remain, and would be in many respects strengthened, when the powers were transferred to the new County Council. He thought if hon. Members would take the trouble to examine the Acts under which Provisional Orders were made, they would see that there were careful safeguards in all particulars, and that it would be very difficult for the new County Councils to abuse their powers if they wished to. He was surprised at the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench on that (the Opposition) side of the House. They had heard a great deal about trusting the people and extending in all possible ways the power of the County Councils. They had now reached the limit to which right hon. Gentlemen on these Front Benches were prepared to trust the people, and they had also reached the point at which they were inclined to assist right hon. Gentlemen opposite in diminishing, rather than increasing, the powers of the new County Bodies, and therefore in preventing, as he feared, many public spirited men from taking a part in the work of those Bodies. He thought that the Government, if they accepted this Amendment, which, for certain reasons, he thought they might fairly do, might give them some promise that they would not go further to meet the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chaplin), and remove from this clause altogether any reference to the more important powers contained in the Schedule.

MR. C. T. DYKE ACLAND (Cornwall, Launceston) said, that, unfortunately, he had been absent from the House for a few moments, and had not had the advantage of hearing what had been said by the right hon. Gentlemen sitting near him; but he ventured, having been for many years associated with county business, and being most anxious that this Bill should be a thorough success, to express a hope that the Government would not yield on this Amendment. They had heard a good deal about the thin edge of the wedge, and it seemed to him that this was an attempt to insert it. They were now, for the first time on this clause—one of the most important clauses of the Bill—they were now told that the advantages which they believed the measure to possess might gradually be whittled away. If ever there was a case in which the thin edge of the wedge was inserted, this was it. If the Government were earnest about the Bill, as he believed they were, one of the most important points they had to bear in mind was that the rural electors of the country districts should understand thoroughly what they were about in the most important act they had to do in the first inception of these County Councils. They ought to know the exact purpose for which they were going to elect the gentlemen they were to trust. Were they to be empowered to deal fairly and frankly, and with a full sense of responsibility, with all the local questions which came before them, or were they to have small powers, not knowing how the other powers were to come, how they were to be left to them, or what they were expected to do? Let them know what duties the members of the County Councils were to be expected to perform, and then they would be able thoroughly to trust them to perform those duties.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER said, he regretted that his hon. Friend (Mr. C. T. Dyke Acland) was not present when the arguments which had been used in the case had been set forth by right hon. Gentlemen sitting on that (the Front Opposition) Bench. This was a question which ought not to be settled on Party lines, and he hoped they would, without being led away by any such spirit, advantageously carry out all their intentions in making these County Councils efficient and satisfactory. He was glad to hear the hon. and learned Member for East Somersetshire (Mr. Hobhouse) was so far advanced as to trust the people; because he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) thought that in previous discussions and Divisions on the Bill the hon. and learned Member had not supported those on that (the Opposition) side of the House who advocated trusting the people. That, however, was not a question of trusting the people, but one of practical administration and legislation; and what they contended, and would continue to contend, was that it was desirable, at the proper time, that these powers should be transferred not only to the County Councils but to the Borough Councils. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chaplin) said that at present that should not be done by this Statute, and for the reason that there were certain powers mentioned in the Schedule which ought not to be included. He was prepared himself to argue that at the proper time, and also that there were a great many powers which ought to be included, and which were not mentioned in the Schedule. Now, what was proposed was that these transfers should be effected from time by Orders made by Parliament—embodied in Provisional Orders which should require the sanction of Parliament—under which these duties should be performed by the County Councils. The practical objection to the immediate transfer of these powers was that the County Councils had not and would not for some time possess that costly experience and that expensive staff required to carry out these Provisional Orders and various other county matters which were at present in the hands of the Board of Trade and this House. To raise the question of trusting or not trusting the people upon a matter of this sort was altogether beside the mark. He yielded to no man in his wish to make the County Councils as dignified and powerful and successful as they could be made, and yet he was not prepared, because he desired that, to put the Councils in a position in which they would be practically impotent—to put them in a position to do the things they ought not to do, and to leave undone those things which they ought to do. They would not have the machinery at present to carry out their legislative duties. With reference to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, it only dealt with the question of Section 1. When they came to the question as to Section 2 they would have to deal with the subject of education, for instance, with the question of transferring the powers as to education to the County Councils, and he should not be one to agree to that. But as to transferring certain powers from the Board of Trade and the Local Government Board, that implied merely the transference of administrative acts relating to sanitary matters, to water, piers and harbours, gas, electric lighting, and so on, the performance of which would require a staff such as was in the hands of the Government Departments. He must protest against the extraordinary position in which they would find themselves placed, if this Amendment were rejected, that the Municipal Authorities of such towns as Birmingham, Manchester, and Liverpool would not be allowed to discharge those duties, though they had the necessary staff, whilst the County Councils, though they had not the staff possessed by those Municipalities, would be called upon at a moment's notice to discharge these duties. So far as those Boroughs which were Counties were concerned, it was provided that this jurisdiction was not to be conferred upon them. It could not be, because they would be exercising jurisdiction over themselves—and there was a jurisdiction to be exercised between contending jurisdictions. His object in rising, however, was to say this —that whether they were right or wrong from an administrative or legislative point of view, this was a practical question. It did not raise the question of trusting or mistrusting the people at all, but simply a question as to what was the most economical and efficient way of doing the work.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was bound to express his surprise that an hon. Member on the Front Opposition Bench, who had been a Member of a Government and had had considerable experience, should come and take part in a debate on a subject as to which he had not heard a word that had been said until he himself rose. The hon. Member, he supposed, was not aware that the Amendment had been discussed for some time and that it was accepted by almost everyone who spoke on the Opposition side. ["No, no!"] Well, it was accepted by almost every Gentleman on that side who spoke up to within the last few moments, and by the Committee generally. Everyone appeared to be in its favour, and the Government, seeing that such was the case, had agreed to accept it. Now, he wished to say a word or two in reply to the hon. and learned Member for East Somersetshire (Mr. Hobhouse). He thought that the hon. and learned Member was under some misapprehension. He spent some moments in pointing out to the Committee how entirely the position of the Allotments Act would be altered by the acceptance of the Amendment. He (Mr. Chaplin) hoped the hon. and learned Member would pardon him for saying that, unless his memory deceived him, the hon. and learned Member was entirely mistaken on that point. The position of the Allotments Act would not be altered one iota by the acceptance of the Amendment, for the proceedings under that Act were governed by the Act itself, and were provided for in the Statute. Therefore, on that ground he thought the hon. and learned Member need be under no apprehension whatsoever. Then the hon. and learned Member spoke of the string of Amendments standing in his (Mr. Chaplin's) name in regard to these questions, and said that he was perfectly prepared to accept the present proposal, and to agree with the Government, provided they would give an assurance that they would accept no more of his (Mr. Chaplin's) Amendments, and go no further in that direction. Well, he (Mr. Chaplin) had three Amendments on the Paper dealing with this subject, but two of them were thoroughly consequential. He had another Amendment down, and it was precisely the same as one standing in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the recognized Leader of the Opposition upon this question—namely, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld). He thought that with these observations he had dispelled the apprehensions of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hobhouse). ["No, no!"] Well, perhaps it was impossible to dispel the hon. and learned Member's apprehensions; but, at all events, he had done his best to do so, and, at any rate, he had dispelled the apprehensions of most of the Members of the Committee, if they had entertained any. He now turned to the hon. Gentleman who had only come into the House within the last few minutes, and with regard to him he would say that he had come after they had been discussing this matter now for a long time, and when the period was approaching that they should go to a Division. ["No, no!"] He was speaking with a desire for the real progress of the Bill—an anxiety which hon. Members opposite, when they commenced these discussions, all seemed to share. Nearly all the Members on the Opposition Benches, when the measure was first introduced, expressed themselves in favour of it, and anxious to see it carried to a successful issue. Well, it must be obvious that when a question had been thoroughly discussed on both sides of the Committee, if at the last moment Gentlemen were to come trooping in who had heard nothing of the debate, and rushed blindly into the fray, discussing the whole thing over again, the Committee might sit here from now to the crack of doom and never come to a conclusion of their labours. He thought the time had come when a decision ought to be taken, and he, therefore, claimed to move "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN declined to put the Question.

MR. C. T. DYKE ACLAND said, he must just remark, in reply to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that he entirely adhered to the opinion he had already expressed. He believed it to be of the utmost importance that the electors should know exactly what it was that they were to elect representatives to do, and he ventured to point to this difference between the boroughs and the County Councils. It must be remembered that there could be borough districts as well as rural districts. In the borough districts there was already a great amount of civic life, and there was none in the rural districts. The rural districts would approach this problem from an entirely different point of view, as an entirely new thing, as a new kind of life they were to enter upon. Well, the desire was to make that life as real as possible. He ventured to suggest that the object of the hon. Gentlemen, who had been supporting this Amendment, would be equally well—in fact, from his point of view, much better met by dealing with the subject in detail in the Schedule. Let them settle that certain powers, whatever they were to be, should be definitely transferred for good, and then when it came to discussing what the powers were to be, let the Committee settle them one by one, with their eyes open, knowing that they would be transferred to the County Councils.

MR. HOBHOUSE said, that as the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chaplin) would not allow him to make an explanation in the midst of his speech, perhaps he might be permitted to do it now. He was fully acquainted with the provisions of the Allotments Act; and he had quoted that Act for the purpose of showing that the Government, with the full consent of the Committee, had conferred on the County Councils, although they were not then in existence, a stronger power than any which it was proposed to confer upon them by this Bill.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he had listened with great attention to the discussion which had taken place, because he had felt considerable doubt as to the operation of the Amendment as affecting this section. While he did not wish, in any way, to put any blame on the Government for the course they had taken, after hearing such discussion as had occurred up to the time when the right hon. Gentleman who was in charge of the Bill spoke, he ventured to suggest to the Committee that they would be rather taking a wrong course if they adopted the Amendment now, and that the proper policy would be to discuss the objections which were raised to the transfer of these powers to the County Councils when they were to deal with those powers in the Schedules.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, it seemed to him that they were in an almost impossible situation. The Bill seemed to contemplate the transfer of certain powers now exercised by Government Departments to the hands of the County Councils; but there was great doubt as to what powers should be transferred and what should not. The Government said they could get over the difficulty by transferring nothing at all, leaving it to a Government of the day to transfer the powers one by one by an Order in Council. That seemed to him to be an abnegation of the powers of the House, and altogether a most unsatisfactory method of proceeding.

MR. LAWSON said, he did not think he ever heard any argument more unreasonable than the contention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin)—namely, that the debate on what was practically one of the most important Amendments of the Bill should come to an abrupt termination before hon. Members had had time to consider it in all its bearings. The right hon. Gentleman himself had spoken twice; but the right hon. Gentleman himself had not had an opportunity of hearing what Liberals representing rural constituencies on that (the Opposition) side of the House had to say to it. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) said, this was not a Party question, but it was a question of the municipal boroughs as against the counties and the Metropolis, and he must say that it was most unreasonable that the Government should expect the matter to be regulated wholly by the wishes of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke, who simply spoke on behalf of the Municipal Corporations. He should like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton to consider the immense number of questions involved in this incidious Amendment, and the interest which this subject must naturally have for rural districts which were expecting to have their County authority. No less than 40 different powers were to be transferred under the 3rd part of the Schedule, as it stood from the Local Government Board to the County Councils, and now it was proposed that these powers should not be transferred in the Bill, but should be dealt with singly from time to time by Orders in Council. It appeared to him (Mr. Lawson) most derogatory to the dignity of the County Councils to proceed in this way. It seemed to him that if it were desired to get good men to serve and work upon them, every possible means should be taken to render them dignified and far-reaching in their functions; but now it was hastily proposed by this Amendment to cut away the greater part of the work that would be given to the Councils under the Bill. He could well conceive that there were a great number of Members representing rural constituencies who had a claim to be heard, and who would claim to be heard before the Committee came to a decision on this most important point.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) said, he was glad the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had spoken as he had done, because as a Metropolitan Member he showed what sympathy he had with the Liberal Members for the counties. It was a strange kind of plea for ending this discussion for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division to tell the House that they had had discussion enough when no Members for rural constituencies on the Liberal side of the House had spoken, and when the right hon. Gentleman himself had taken up a considerable portion of the time of the Committee by two speeches. The fact was that the Government by accepting the Amendment, and the Front Opposition Bench by agreeing to the course the Government were taking, thought they could terminate the discussion. [Cries of "Divide!" and interruption.] If he were interrupted in this way, he would promise the Committee to occupy the whole 25 minutes which remained before the hour at which the Chairman left the Chair. It was all very well for the Government to say that they were anxious to make this Bill a reality. If they kept this Amendment they clearly showed they were anxious to do nothing of the kind. There was something in the way of flesh and blood and skin on this skeleton of a Bill when it was introduced, but the Government and their supporters were now working like vultures, pecking away every bit of substance from the framework of it, and he (Mr. Conybeare) ventured to think that if this Amendment were passed there would be nothing of the measure left but a bare skeleton. He (Mr. Conybeare) and those who sat around him had the strongest objection to having everything left in a state of chaotic confusion by the Amendment proposed. He could not understand what the Front Bench on that the Opposition side of the House were thinking of. They proposed to accept an Amendment which struck at the root of everything valuable in the Bill; and all he could say was, that he and his Friends as County Members, sitting on the Opposition side of the House, intended to make their voices heard in the matter. They did not intend to have their birthright sold for a mess of pottage. They did not intend to have these County Councils established with practically no functions and no duties worth the name left to them to perform. It was simply reducing the whole idea of the County Councils to a miserable farce and sham. He had thought it was a sham from the beginning, but now he was certain of it. There was no reason why hon. Members sitting on the Opposition side of the House who were frankly in favour of democratic institutions should make themselves a party to such a sham, and they who represented county constituencies—whatever hon. Gentlemen sitting above the Gangway might do—did not intend to allow this Amendment to pass without a strong protest. It had been said that this was a question between boroughs and counties. He believed it was. At any rate, those who had spoken from the Opposition side of the House for the Amendment appeared to be the Representatives of boroughs, and not of counties. If the boroughs thought they would be placed at a disadvantage by this clause being passed in its original form—if they thought that the County Councils would have powers given to them which would be detrimental to the boroughs—that was no reason why the County Councils should be made a sham and a farce. It would be the duties of the boroughs to get these duties transferred to themselves as well, and he could not conceive that there was any reason whatever for the line taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) in arguing in favour of the Amendment, why the county should not have that which would make the County Council a reality and not a sham. It had been pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board that a difficulty would be created, because, if they clothed the County Councils with the powers contained in the Bill, they would have no efficient or skilled staff to carry them out. He (Mr. Conybeare), however, maintained that that was not the case. It might be that at the present the Local Government Board had all the skilled and efficient and trained staff that might be necessary to carry out these powers. Well, what was easier than to place the services of these trained officials at the disposal of the County Councils? If the powers were taken away from the Government Department and transferred to the County Councils, those who had hitherto carried out those powers could follow the transfer and become the agents of the County Councils, as they had hitherto been the agents of the Local Government Board or the Board of Trade. He ventured to say that they could find plenty of men able and willing to carry out these powers if they were transferred to the County Councils. The fact that the counties had no such trained staff at this moment was not a sufficient ground for refusing to grant the powers claimed by the Representatives of the people. He wished to point out the disadvantage of adopting either of the Amendments under consideration. One of these Amendments was the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), that Orders in Council should transfer these powers, from time to time, to the County Council. He believed hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House had expressed their preference that Provisional Order Bills in the transfer of these powers rather than Orders in Council. So far as he was concerned, he did not care which was adopted, as he believed that either would be very mischievous. Practically no one was aware of what was being done when measures of this kind were passed. Provisional Order Bills were placed on the Table at the time of Private Business; nothing was said about them and hardly anybody knew what they were. He would illustrate that by pointing to what had taken place this Session in regard to a Bill connected with piers and harbours, promoted by the Torquay Local Board. Hardly anyone knew the effect of that Bill, and nothing might have been heard of it if it had not been that certain events which had occurred and with which the House was familiar. The people in the districts affected, that was to say, the ratepayers, were not consulted with regard to these Bills, and did not know what was going on in connection with them; and if it were not for the vigilance of some Members of the House, it was possible that in most cases nothing would be known of these measures until they had become Acts of Parliament and practically irrevocable. To suppose that the important functions of these County Councils should be left over and not transferred to them, and then be smuggled into existence, as he might say, in the form of Provisional Order Bills, was reducing the whole question to a farce and an absurdity. As a sincere admirer of the effort of genius of the right hon. Gentleman who had produced this Bill, he was most anxious that it should be made a reality and not a mere sham. There was one other reason why they should protest against this proposed abnegation of their powers as a Committee of the House of Commons, and that was, that the one principal reason why they had been so desirous of seeing a Bill of this kind passed, was in order to relieve the House of Commons of a great deal of unnecessary work. He and his Friends supported the Bill as a measure of decentralization. If any powers were to be conferred by Provisional Order Bills—

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to claim that the Question be now put.

MR. CONYBEARE said, he was not going to take up that quarter of an hour, but as the Representative of a county, he had a perfect right to express his opinion on this question. He was saying that they regarded this measure—and had always regarded a measure of this kind—as a necessary measure of decentralization—to relieve the Boards of Guardians, and to take over the various functions exercised by Government Departments, and vest the management of the affairs of local districts in the hands of elected representatives of those districts. He objected to a measure which would throw on their shoulders a vast deal more business than they had to perform at the present time. On these grounds, as well as on the ground—though he was sorry to say some of his own Party rather repudiated it—on the ground that they wished to repose every confidence in the representatives of the people on these County Councils, he objected to limiting and hedging about and destroying the powers to be conferred on the Councils, before they were brought into existence, by the Amendment under discussion.

MR. FULLER (Wilts, Westbury) said, he wished to remind the Committee of the fact that in almost every county in England the provisions of this Bill had been most carefully considered by the Court of Quarter Sessions, and, so far as he could gather from reading reports of their proceedings, not one of them had expressed any feeling of distrust or fear in any way that the County Councils would not be competent to discharge these functions. This point under consideration was, he thought, a most important one, involving the most important of the powers to be transferred by Section 8 of the Bill. If the section had not been generally approved of by the Courts of Quarter Sessions throughout the country, there would have been some clear expression of opinion, on the part of those Bodies, to the effect that the County Councils would not be the proper Bodies to entrust with the discharge of these functions. He was sorry that there should be any doubt on this subject; and in regard to the difficulty of obtaining the machinery sufficient to carry out the provisions of Section 8, they must remember that the machinery could not well be created until some decision had been arrived at as to the work that was to be expected of it. He, therefore, thought it a great misfortune that the Government had retreated on this point, and had not at once decided to hand the powers of Section 8 over to the County Councils, believing, as he did, that they would be perfectly capable of carrying them out.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells) said, he should like to be allowed to say a word or two in reply to the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Westbury Division of Wilts (Mr. Fuller). The hon. Member had not discovered that at any meetings of Courts of Quarter Sessions exception had been taken to the proposal to transfer the powers mentioned in this section to the County Councils. He (Sir Richard Paget) would like to call the hon. Member's attention to the fact that at a meeting of a Society consisting solely of Chairmen of Quarter Sessions this point was carefully considered, and it was there agreed unanimously, without any difference of opinion whatever, that it would be in the highest degree unwise to transfer these powers to the County Councils. He wished to say that, because whatever difference of opinion there might have been at the meeting to which he referred, after debate on various other parts of the Bill, this was, at any rate, a point upon which there was unanimity. In the future, no doubt it would be well to transfer the powers to a Body possessing all the necessary attributes; but, for the present, it was thought unwise to transfer them to the County Councils.

MR. STANSFELD said, that before they went to a Division he begged leave to say a few words as to his own personal position in the matter. He had begun his last speech by saying that he had expected that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would have either revised the schedule or stated that he would revise it. He (Mr. Stansfeld) had said—and he now repeated it—that he thought that would have been the best mode of proceeding. The right hon. Gentleman had not taken that course, however. He (Mr. Stansfeld) could quite understand that the right hon. Gentleman had been tempted and easily induced to avail himself of the opportunity of deferring a subject which would have led to considerable discussion. That was intelligible, whether he approved of the course or not. He had then gone on to say that he was opposed to the Amendment of the right hon.

Mr. Fuller

Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), because he was opposed to Sub-section 2. His objection to Sub-section 2 was not that he thought these powers should only be dealt with by legislation. He thought that they might fairly be dealt with by Provisional Order; but he imagined that the right hon. Gentleman did not contemplate proceeding by Provisional Order, but by Orders in Council, which were not made the subjects of Bills brought in, discussed, and passed into law. He should undoubtedly divide against the Amendment.

MR. RITCHIE said, he thought he had led the right hon. Gentleman to understand that the Government were prepared to accept the proposal with reference to Provisional Orders. He would suggest to his right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) that, in place of the Amendment he had proposed, the words he proposed to leave out should remain in, and these words should be added—

“It shall be lawful for the Local Government Board to make, from time to time, Provisional Orders for transferring.”

That would meet the difficulty of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and also the desire of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin).

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was surprised to hear the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax that he would vote against the Amendment, because it was clearly understood by the Committee that the proposal would be accepted both by the Government and by the right hon. Gentleman and one or two of his Colleagues sitting near him, provided that the suggestion of the Government as to Provisional Orders, which had just been announced, were adopted. That really was the understanding.

MR. STANSFELD said, the right hon. Gentleman was going too far in saying that he (Mr. Stansfeld) accepted this proposal. He had said that he should have preferred another course, and he had passed on to Sub-head 2, with reference to which he himself had an Amendment on the Paper. He therefore had not committed himself to the question. In any case, he had said he should wish for an alteration.

MR. CHAPLIN said, the right hon. Gentleman had certainly given him, and almost everyone else in the Committee, to understand that he accepted the proposal. This Amendment was accepted by the Government in order to meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Chaplin) confessed he was of opinion that the second paragraph of Sub-section 2 was sufficient. He should have been satisfied with that paragraph himself; but as he understood that the Amendment proposed by the Government met the views of the right hon. Gentleman, he would raise no objection to it, and would be prepared to accept it in lieu of his own.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 24, after the word "day," insert the words "it shall be lawful for the Local Government Board to make from time to time Provisional Orders for transferring."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, it would be felt by the Committee, that a new issue had been raised by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in order to meet his (Mr. Morley's) right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax. Having regard to the hour, he begged to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. John Morley.)

MR. CHAPLIN asked the indulgence of the Committee to say a word or two on this Motion. There could be no doubt that there had been a general understanding arrived at as to the acceptance of that particular proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax and his Friends sitting beside him. An appeal had been made by that right hon. Gentleman to the President of the Local Government Board asking him to assent to the principle that this transfer of powers should be effected by Provisional Orders instead of Orders in Council. Did the right hon. Gentleman deny that? And the appeal was made in such a way as to convey the impression that no other arrangement was possible, and that if the proposal was assented to the matter was concluded so far as hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Opposition side of the House were concerned. He was speaking now of what was heard by a great number of people in the Committee, and it was impossible to put a different construction on it. If they were to depart from understandings of that kind, he did not see how they could hope to go on amicably. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill had said he was aware of the objection of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax, and would agree to an Amendment which would remove it. The question was in that way practically closed and settled, but then in came the hon. Member for Launceston, who rushed into the debate without having heard a word of what had been said, and the result was this long wrangle.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): said, he desired to appeal to right hon. Gentlemen opposite. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman who had moved to report Progress and the Committee generally were anxious to make progress with the measure, and he would ask, therefore, whether the principle of that Amendment had not been very fully considered. There had been speeches from the right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench which showed general concurrence with the principle of the Amendment. The Government had no desire to force that proposal on the House; but they were naturally desirous of making progress.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, he was sincerely sorry he was not able to meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman did them (the Opposition) no more than justice, when he said he believed they were anxious that progress should be made with the Bill. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, speaking for himself, he was anxious to make progress with the Bill. He wished the Committee to recall to its mind what happened last night. When the Committee got to a certain degree of heat—as it had now—they adjourned, and the subject which had caused the confusion was settled that day in daylight, when they met to go on with the Amendments, in an hour. He was persuaded that if they reported Progress now, within half-an-hour or an hour on Friday morning they would be able to see their way out of the present difficulty, and to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. As to what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) the right hon. Gentleman made complaint of the attitude taken up by Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Benches. The complaint could not be a very formidable or serious one, inasmuch as it had not come from and was not endorsed by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board.

MR. CHAPLIN: I claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think there would be any economy of time in putting that Question at this hour.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) said, that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had stated that he would introduce some other Amendments dealing with the points just now under discussion on some other clause. When those Amendments were put on the Paper they would be able to make satisfactory progress with the Bill.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said, it seemed to him that when a proposal was made, the effect of which was to change the Bill in a vital particular from a compulsory measure into a permissive one, a motion to report progress was thoroughly justified. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) ought to withdraw the scolding he had addressed to the Opposition and apologize for it.

MR. HALLEY STEWART said, that attention had been drawn to the fact that last night the Committee got into a muddle from which it was extracted this morning in a very short time. The Government themselves had landed the Committee in a muddle this afternoon, and, therefore, were not entitled to ask the Committee for its forbearance.

MR. RITCHIE said, he could not allow the last observation to pass without challenge. The Government had landed the Committee in no muddle so far as he could see, and not only had the Government not taken that step, but the Committee was in no muddle whatever. The issue was perfectly plain and simple to those Members who had been in the House, and he thought he was right in saying that the proposal which the Government had accepted had been accepted after they had reason to believe that it would meet with the entire approval of the Benches opposite.

MR. WADDY said, that some of them on that (the Opposition) side of the House believed that the alteration now proposed was one of principle and not of form. They did not believe that the Board of Trade, or the Local Government Board, would be likely to cut its own throat, and put an end to itself merely for the purpose of having its work done by County Councils. The proposal of the Government was a very dangerous one, and should be seriously and fully debated.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday, at Two of the clock.

BISHOP'S AUTHORITY REGULATION BILL.

On Motion of Colonel Sandys, Bill to regulate Proceedings under "The Church Discipline Act, 1840," and "The Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874," and to amend the same, ordered to be brought in by Colonel Sandys, Mr. Wardle, Mr. Joicey, and Colonel Saunderson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 300.]

It being ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTIONS.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT SECURITIES. RESOLUTION.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) said, the Motion he had to bring forward that evening was of a far-reaching and very important character. It referred to a subject with which he was very familiar, and he should not, therefore, have to detain the House at undue length in explaining it. The question he was about to deal with was very anxiously watched by our Colonies and by those in England interested in them. It was also watched with equal anxiety by those persons in the United Kingdom who, as trustees or beneficiaries, were concerned in the investment of trust money. He thought it would be interesting to the House if he gave one or two details on three points which seemed to him most important in connection with the subject of his Resolution. One of those was the necessity which existed for action in the direction in which he wished the House to travel; the second point was with regard to the actual value, from a financial point of view, of Colonial Government Securities; and the third and last point, which he would deal with very briefly, would be the facilities for action in the direction which he advocated. He would premise that he did not intend to advocate the laying down of any positive law, but that he merely wished that permissive power should be given both to Colonial Governments and to trustees and others who were in charge of trust monies. He might add, that he wished, so far as he could, to give effect to the results of the discussion which took place upon the subject at the Colonial Conference of last year. In the first place, with regard to the necessity for action in this direction, they had absolute proof that such action was necessary, and they also had relative proof in the legislation which had already taken place in recent years. The absolute proof was, that while the wealth of the country placed in the hands of trustees was on the increase, the opportunities for investment of these trust monies was on the decrease. There were various indications, and a great many statistics could be brought forward to prove that the trust wealth of the country was very rapidly increasing. He could mention that death properties for the last 15 years had increased from the annual value of £120,000,000 to £180,000,000; and they also knew that new securities admitted to quotation last year amounted to £175,000,000. These statistics proved that there had been almost a fabulous increase in the relative wealth of the United Kingdom, and he should not be far wrong in saying that during the last 30 years the amount of that wealth had increased by something like 70 or 80 per cent, and it was no unfair assumption to say that the amount of money entrusted to trustees for investment had increased in like proportion. When they turned to the securities available for the investment of trust monies, they found there had not been anything like a proportionate increase in available securities. Consols and other funds under Government control had decreased by £100,000,000, roughly speaking, within the last 30 or 35 years. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his great Conversion Scheme, which had met with so well-merited and such universal success, had relieved this country of a further burden of £100,000,000 of debt. He reminded the House that at the time of the conversion taking place he had a Motion on the Paper which he had not moved, because he did not wish to do anything which would in any way endanger the success of the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman. He would now allude only to one other security in which trustees invested their monies, and that was land; hon. Members would know that in landed securities there has been a great decrease in value, and that there were trustees at the present time who would certainly not invest in landed securities. Therefore, the range of investment available for trustees had decreased; while on the other hand the trust monies had very largely increased. He now came to the relative proof—that was to say, the change which had been effected by recent legislation in connection with this subject. There were a variety of Acts of Parliament under which the Chancery Court or the Judges of the Superior Courts were empowered to make general lists of securities in which trustees could invest. Until quite recently, those general lists included Consols, the Stock of Municipal Corporations in the United Kingdom, and the Stock of the Metropolitan Board of Works, about which latter he would say nothing, because the case of the Board was sub judice at the present moment. The Select Committee, in 1883, added to the list first-class railway debentures; then, at about the same period, a list was made of the securities in which capital monies raised under the Settled Land Act could be invested, and that included Chancery Securities, bonds, mortgages, debentures or debenture stock of any railway company of the United Kingdom which had paid a dividend for 10 years. Shortly before that time, they had passed the Trust Act for Scotland, which provided that trustees might, unless specially prohibited by the constitution or terms of the trust, invest funds in East India Stock or the Stock of any Colonial Government approved by the Court of Chancery or the Court of Session, and also in the bonds of any Colonial Government approved as aforesaid, provided such stocks or bonds were not payable to bearer. Now, in one respect that was precisely what he desired to see made legal in the United Kingdom; but in another respect it was not what he wanted. It met with his approval in respect of the fact that the list included the Inscribed Stock of any Colonial Government; but he objected to it, because it fixed on the Chancery Court or the Court of Session in Scotland the duty of deciding whether any particular Stock was a fit subject for the investment of trust monies. They knew, on the very highest authority, that this Act had been inoperative, because it threw on the Court of Chancery and the Court of Session the duty of deciding between particular Stocks, which necessitated expensive inquiry at the cost of those wishing to invest; but he believed the Judges also felt that in excluding any Stock specifically they were doing an injury to the security which it might not deserve. He had pointed out the necessity which existed for increasing the means of investment for trustees, and he had shown that recent legislation had tended in the direction which he thought desirable. He now wished to call the attention of the House to what he might term the intrinsic value of Government Securities for trust investments, and that was a point on which he was perfectly satisfied many hon. Members were better informed than himself—among them the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers), whom he was glad to see in his place. He would mention a few facts which he believed would be interesting to the House. In the first place, these Government Securities were of great magnitude at the present time. He had made out a list of Securities which showed that the total value of British Government Securities was £840,000,000; the total value of British Local Corporation Securities, £78,000,000; Colonial Government Securities and Inscribed Stock, £115,000,000, and Foreign Government Stock, £714,000,000. From that they would see that Colonial Stock had already taken a prominent place in the field of investment. These Colonial Government Securities, he would point out, represented money lent to the Colonies, and chiefly supplied to the Colonies from the hoarded capital of the United Kingdom. He might mention incidentally that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had received in taxes and stamps on these Colonial Government loans a sum which already exceeded £800,000, so that the Exchequer of the country had benefited to that extent directly from loans made to Colonial Governments. But those loans had a greater and more direct value with regard to the United Kingdom. It had been calculated, on the high authority of the Agent General of the Cape Colony, that no less than 85 per cent of Colonial loans were expended on the products of the United Kingdom, especially in machinery, rails and other manufactures. Then he need hardly enlarge on the fact that those loans opened up our Colonies for trade and for the people; and were it not for those loans, which amounted to £230,000,000, the Colonies would not now be, as they were, the most profitable openings for investment and commerce. Another point which he wished to impress upon the House was the rapid growth of the Colonial loans. They had increased in less than 35 years from £5,000,000 to nearly £230,000,000. In the Australian Colonies, in 1851, there was a total borrowed capital of £58,000; now there was a borrowed capital of £140,000,000. The Crown Colonies in the year 1851 had a total borrowed capital of £890,000, and now the total stood at £6,000,000. In North America there was a total borrowed capital, in 1851, of £4,000,000, and the total borrowed capital now was £54,000,000. In South Africa, in 1851, there was no Public Debt, whereas last year the Public Debt amounted to £26,000,000. He would like to call the attention of the House to a few curious and interesting facts in connection with Colonial loans. With regard to the Income Tax, he had only been able to get Returns relating to the 11 years from 1872 to 1883. Those Returns told them that of the Incomes under Schedule C, returnable for Income Tax from what he might call roughly Government Securities, had remained at about £21,000,000 sterling; the incomes from Government Security in India had also remained equal at about £7,000,000. Incomes derived from Foreign Government Securities were, in 1872, £9,000,000, and they had fallen in 1883 to £6,800,000, a fall of no less than £2,600,000. He did not know whether this fall in the incomes derived from Foreign Government Securities was due to anything in the nature of repudiation, or non-payment of interest, or to the dislike which the British public had to invest in foreign securities; but he said, while the income from foreign securities had fallen by £2,600,000 in 11 years, the income from Colonial Securities had risen by no less a sum than £3,600,000, and they stood in 1883 at £6,700,000, and that increase he believed was still going on. He thought he had shown, at all events, that the investing public had acquired confidence in Colonial Government Securities, as opposed to the securities of Foreign Governments. They had heard frequently that the Colonies were piling up enormous Debts, although they had no European wars to provide for; and that in some Colonies the Debt represented something like £40 per head of the population. That was looked upon by some as a matter of great grief. It seemed to him that, in considering that fact, they should bear in mind three things. In the first place, they should consider what were the prospects of the Colonies. They knew that the Colonies were in process of enormously rapid growth. He would not trouble the House with details, but to arrive at an index number they might add together millions of external trade, internal trade, shipping, and population. If those elements of prosperity were added together, they would find that, in 1851, the prosperity of the Colonies was represented by 75, and that it had in 30 years increased fivefold, and was now represented by 370. That rapid growth had not ceased, but was still in active progress. Again, they must remember that in natural wealth our Colonies had resources which had not yet been by any means fully developed; there was the fertile soil and genial climate, and there were, as in South Africa, besides mineral wealth many other resources. To those natural advantages they should add all the artificial advantages, such as railways, telegraphs, and other works of civilization, in which the Colonies had made enormous strides. The second point was that our Colonies, especially the self-governing Colonies, were controlled by Englishmen, who, above all things, were practical men and knew that they were trusted at home, because of the enormous mass of private capital sent out from this country to carry on various industrial enterprizes in the Colonies. The third observation he had to make was that they should ask themselves on what these Colonial loans had been expended. He had been into this subject in great detail, and he must ask the House to take on trust the result he was now able to lay before them. He found that of the total of £230,000,000 of Debt, £145,000,000 had been expended on railways; £56,000,000 on harbours and other directly remunerative works; and something like £7,000,000 or £8,000,000 in introducing population to the Colonies. Roughly speaking, 90 per cent of the total amount of loans made to our Colonies by this country had been expended on what he might call directly remunerative works. There remained about £25,000,000 which had been expended on such unremunerative objects as deficiencies in revenue, war expenses, and the floating of loans. He reminded the House that the Chancery Lists of Trust Investments included the Stocks of Municipalities in the United Kingdom; and he ventured to say that no Municipality could show so excellent a record of remunerative expenditure as our Colonies could produce. If they required further proof than that, they had only to look to the Money Market for the value placed on Colonial Securities, and they would find that in the last 15 years interest had fallen, on an average, from 6 to 4 per cent. They would also find that many 4 per cent Colonial Securities now stood at £105 to £106—that was to say, at a premium of from £5 to £6 per cent. A recent Canadian loan, issued at 92½, now stood at nearly 96. He found that all the Colonial 4 per Cent Stocks stood at above £106, except the New Zealand Stock, which was at 99. On the other hand, the price of 4 per Cents, 5 per Cents, and 5½ per Cents in the great countries of Europe did not exceed £100, except in the case of French Stock, which stood at £104. The Argentine Republic Stock stood at £98, and United States 4 per Cent Stock stood at a premium of £129 per cent. He hoped he had said enough to show that while there was a necessity for increasing the field of investment for trustees, Colonial Government Securities were, at all events, worthy of consideration. He now came to his third subject. It might be asked, if these securities were as good as they were represented to be, how was it that they had not yet appeared on the list of the Court of Chancery. That matter had been fully gone into at the Colonial Conference of last year, and at the commencement of the discussion there were laid before the delegates two objections made some years ago by the Lord Chancellor. Those two objections were very pertinent and very practical, the first of them being that there was no means in this country of suing a Colonial Government, and the second objection was that there was no limit of issue to Colonial loans. The first objection that there was an entire absence of the means for holders of Colonial Stock of enforcing their claims for interest or repayment against Colonial Governments in this country was an objection which, although serious, had been grappled with by the Colonial Conference, and he could state that it no longer existed, because every Colonial Government was perfectly willing to take such measures as would render its Agent easily suable in England in respect of the interest or the repayment of the loans. Then, as to there being no limit of issue, which was a more grave matter, the value of Government Stock depended ultimately on the solvency of the nation raising the loan, and trustees would have to depend on the solvency of the Colony in whose stocks they invested. But there was a remedy, and he ventured to say a practical one, in this case—namely, that in any Act of Parliament which should authorize the Court of Chancery to admit Colonial Government Securities to the list of Trust Investments, it would be possible to state that those investments might be made in the case of any particular Colony, the stock of which—for instance, its Four per Cent Stock—was at par. That would have the effect of establishing an automatic rule leaving the solvency of the Colony to be judged on the London Stock Exchange. But he had not proposed to suggest any remedy of his own; he merely alluded to that to show that there was an automatic means of settling the point. He would like to mention briefly another objection which had been urged, which was that by increasing the credit of the Colonies, as they would do by such a measure, they would be interfering with the Government Funds of this country in respect of their market value. He did not think that would be an unmixed evil. If there were a large demand for our rapidly diminishing Public Securities, some who had money in Consols would get more interest for the price they paid for those Consols. But even if they did some small damage to the credit of the United Kingdom, he imagined that its credit would be on so high a pedestal that the damage would be trifling as compared with the good they would do to the Colonies. He trusted he had given reasons to justify his hope that eventually the Legislature would take such steps as might be necessary to realize the object of the Resolution he had placed on the Paper. He thought that by adopting his proposal, they would be conferring an advantage upon the people of this country, and upon our fellow-subjects in the Colonies; they would be supplying trustees, and above all the beneficiaries under trusts with a much needed channel of investment, and they would certainly be doing something to promote the credit and trade of the Colonies. His object was, however, to ventilate this subject, and to lay this statement before the House rather than to suggest any particular method of dealing with the subject. He had heard that legislation of this kind might soon be proceeded with in "another place," and he believed that that was a proof of a tendency to act in accordance with the suggestion contained in his Resolution, and he ventured to say that that House would before long proceed in the same direction. He saw in their places hon. Friends who were much given to writing and speaking on the subject of Imperial Federation, and who, he felt sure, would support his Resolution, because the only foundation for a united Empire was that its material interests and resources should be consolidated and utilized. For those reasons he would now move the Resolution standing in his name.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, he rose to second the Resolution which had been introduced by his hon. Friend in so able and exhaustive a speech. He would ask the House first to look upon the question purely from the investor's point of view. There could be no doubt that what was called conversion of the National Debt, although admirable for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, fell on a certain class of individuals very heavily. It meant to a certain class of persons that their whole income was reduced at one fell swoop from £400 to £350 a-year, which might involve the loss of a certain number of small comforts, and in a certain sense, the necessities of life. It was, therefore, only natural that they should seek to find some reasonably secure investments which would give a higher rate of interest than those in which trustees were now allowed to invest. There appeared to him to be a general demand for that; and he would point out that his hon. Friend was by no means without precedents for his Resolution. Thirty years ago, Lord St. Leonards had brought in a Bill which gave powers to trustees to invest in India Four per Cents, and certain other securities, and that Bill which passed into law was followed in 1871 by an Act which enabled trustees to invest in the Stock of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the principle of the present Motion was admitted in the Scotch Trusts Act of 1885. It would, of course, be contended that these cases were not on all fours with the present; and, no doubt, in the case of the India Four per Cents, it might be urged that Indian finance was, to a certain extent, under the control of the Imperial Parliament, which was not the case with any Colonial Securities. But the difference was more apparent than real. Although Parliament exercised some control over Indian finance, he had never been able to ascertain precisely what the control was. He had sometimes come down towards the end of the Session and listened to a discussion on what was called the Indian Budget, when the Secretary of State or the Under Secretary for India made a speech to a select audience of 10 or 12 Members, half of whom were asleep, on the very difficult subject of Indian finance; but he could not help thinking that that sort of control was of very little value. There was, of course, the other difficulty to which his hon. Friend had referred—namely, that there was no power to sue a Colonial Government in this country, as they could the Metropolitan Board of Works, in case of default. But was there any real danger in that respect? Even the smallest South American State now knew that if it made default in respect of the interest or principal, its name would be wiped out of the Stock List of every nation. He believed that, with the exception of Turkey and two or three Central American Republics, there was hardly a State of the World in default; and as to the danger of Colonial Governments making default in the payment of interest on their loans, they might as soon expect the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make default in respect of the interest of the National Debt. As his hon. Friend had pointed out the Debts of the Colonies were not, as in the case of European loans, incurred for the purpose of maintaining bloated armaments, but for remunerative purposes. Mr. Deakin, the representative of Victoria at the late Colonial Conference, said—

“In Victoria, we have scarcely any Debt at all; we have borrowed it is true, £30,000,000, but three-quarters of that is invested in railroads, and these railroads are paying full interest on the investment and also a surplus into the Treasury, so that on three-quarters of the money we simply receive interest and pay it out again. The remainder of our loans, with a small exception, is invested in waterworks, which pay, or before long, will pay, the full amount of interest. Hence there is practically no National Debt, though there are great national assets. The money is invested in commercial enterprises which pay their own interest.”

The same might be said of the other great Colonies. But could it be said of the Debts of the great European countries? Could it be said of the Debt of France, which was incurred entirely for war purposes; or even of our own Debt, on which we paid interest to the amount of more than £20,000,000 a-year, and which was incurred for the purpose of carrying on bloody and too often barren wars? It might be said that the condition of the Colonies might be changed; but he held that it was impossible to get mathematical security in any investment. One of the securities most approved by the Court of Chancery used to be mortgages on freehold estates; and he could point out numerous cases in which trustees had invested money, as they were empowered to do by law, in freeholds, and had lost not only the interest, but more than one-half of their security in consequence of the well-known depreciation of land due to agricultural depression. He could quote the case of Lord Eldon to show how the most prudent of men might be deceived in a matter of that kind. Lord Eldon was the most cautious of Judges, of whom he believed Lord Campbell said that he doubted for a whole month whether there was anything to doubt about. That most cautious Judge, in two cases, only allowed trustees to deviate from the elegant simplicity of "the Three per Cents," as he called it. In one case he allowed the trustees to invest in turnpike bonds, because "nothing could ever supersede roads;" in another case to invest in the purchase of a rotten borough, "because rotten boroughs would last as long as England itself." That showed that the most cautious of men were liable to be misled in the matter of investments. He believed that Lord Halsbury and Lord Herschell approved the principle of his hon. Friend's Motion, which he might say was also entirely approved by one of the Judges, and he would go farther and say that every well-drawn deed contained the powers in question. He had himself several times inserted such a clause both in deeds and wills, and he took it to be the duty of the Legislature to enable trustees to do what prudent trustees would do if they had the power. But there was a broader and more general ground on which he asked the House to accept the Resolution. He had the honour of occupying for some six months the position now so worthily filled by the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, and he was able to say that the adoption of the Resolution would undoubtedly tend to improve the relations between the Colonies and the Mother Country. No one who was acquainted with the proceedings of the Colonial Conference could fail to see how deeply interesting this question was felt to be by the colonies, who he was convinced would regard such action as was here proposed as a graceful recognition of their status. There was not a steamer which discharged its cargo on the shores of our Colonies, there was not a letter sent home, not a telegram which flashed its tale of joy or sorrow from the Mother Country to her children, that was not an additional link to the bonds which bound our Colonies to us, and he believed that nothing would tend more to promote that Imperial unity which they all desired, than the knowledge that the Motion of his hon. Friend had been accepted by the House of Commons.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the suitability of Colonial Government Inscribed Stocks for Trust investments should be more adequately recognized."—(Sir George Baden-Powell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, he approached the consideration of this subject with every desire to do justice to the efforts which the Colonies had made to maintain their credit. It was a sign both of the honesty of our Colonies and of their strength and vitality that, in the comparatively short term of their existence, the credit in which they stood was superior to that of most European countries. He felt how fully they deserved the position which they held in the money market, and no remark would fall from him which could in the slightest degree detract from the gratification which every member of the Empire must feel that not only our own finances were in a satisfactory state, but that there was scarcely a Colony whose finances did not rest on a secure foundation. Our Colonies had borrowed rapidly and freely. His hon. Friend pointed almost with pride to the rapid strides with which they had competed in that respect with Foreign States; but he was not sure that the magnitude of their debt was one of the arguments which would commend itself to the House of Commons. He was not one of those who for one moment would depreciate the sentimental aspect of the question. He quite understood that the Colonies attached importance to the legislative position of their loans. It was not, therefore, from any want of sympathy that he spoke. But we were bound to look at this question not from the point of view of the present only; we must look at it with regard to the future and to all the interests at stake. His hon. Friend admitted that his proposal, if adopted, might do some small damage to the credit of this country. As temporary guardian of that credit, he should be extremely jealous of anything which would trench even in the slightest degree upon it. It was apparent that there was likely to be at all times a tendency to borrow from the State; and looking to the vast number of objects for which it was desired to have recourse to Imperial credit, he, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, must say that nothing ought to be done which could in any way tend to bring about the result which his hon. Friend was able to contemplate with equanimity—namely, a reduction in the price of British Stocks. It was his duty to look to the interest of the credit of the State, and to point out that we must have regard to the tremendous demands which might yet be made upon the credit of the State, and that not in emergencies only, when a difference of 1 per cent in the price of Consols might be of importance to this country. Not only might we have to borrow in great emergencies, but there were many occasions when the State ought to lend for useful purposes. Whatever view might be taken of the Motion, hon. Gentlemen ought to dismiss from their minds that part of the argument which went to show that by adopting it we should not tamper in the slightest degree with the borrowing power of the Imperial Government. His hon. Friend spoke of the difficulty which trustees experienced in finding facilities for investment. He did not see that there was that difficulty which his hon. Friend seemed to think, but he wished to point out what was the essence of the case. The House was not asked simply to authorize investments by trustees in Colonial Funds. What his hon. Friend asked was that where, by will, trustees had been precluded from investing in Colonial Funds the State should set that aside and authorize the inclusion of Colonial Funds. It had been said that in every well-drawn trust Colonial Stocks ought to be included. He certainly thought they ought to be. If he had to establish trusts himself he would probably include a portion of the Colonial Stocks. But it was a different thing to say that where a will had been made and trusts created, and where Colonial Stocks had been excluded, we should step in and say that they ought to be included. That was really what was asked. It was asked that we should establish these securities in a position which was not anticipated by those who made the trusts. He did not say that the proposal, if adopted, would have any great practical effect. But he would like to call attention to some circumstances which might ultimately produce friction. With regard to the action already taken by the Courts of Law, he believed that various options had been given to trustees. For instance, they were allowed to invest in Municipal Stocks, but the Courts had found it extremely difficult to arrive at any conclusion, and the Act had come to be inoperative in regard to those Stocks. With regard to the action of the Scotch Courts, it had been found so difficult to establish what would be a safe Colonial Stock that in this case, too, the law had been practically inoperative. If we legislated in the direction recommended by his hon. Friend and vested the discretion in the Courts, the Courts would probably be averse to undertake it, and the law would be entirely inoperative. He had referred to the possibility of friction, and with regard to this question it must be remembered that we must put all Colonies on the same footing. It would not be possible to draw up a Schedule of Colonies, and say that the credit of this one and of that one was good enough, but that the credit of a third was not good enough to be put on the same footing as Consols. His hon. Friend behind him had given instances of some Colonies which were as safe as possible, and whose credit stood so high that there could be no question, at all events for many years, of their absolute solvency. But we must judge not by the best Colonies, but also by the weakest. It would be impossible to draw up a list. Was the Court of Chancery, then, to consider the credit of all the various Colonies; were the Judges to meet and say what was the borrowing power of each Colony? With the greatest reverence for those august gentlemen, he doubted whether that was a task for which they were properly qualified. His hon. Friend had, with great ingenuity, invented an automatic process by which it could be decided whether the Stocks of a Colony were to be admitted or not. He had proposed that when the Four per Cent Stock of a Colony stood above par investment should be permitted in its funds, and vice versa. But he would ask the House to remember that the very object of trusts was to give a permanent security. Why was money put under trust at all? Simply in order to give a more permanent character to the investment than could be given to it otherwise. If they were to judge any Stock by its value at a given moment, they would be applying a test which, in the end, would be misleading. A Stock might be above par at issue and then fall below it. The hon. Member had compared the value of these Stocks with those of foreign countries, and had shown that, greatly to the credit of the Anglo-Saxon communities, their Stocks stood higher. But none of these foreign Stocks were, or ought to be, included in trusts. They stood in the category of those Stocks which might be invested in if the testator chose to select them, but no Parliament would assert that it was right to include the Stocks of any foreign country, however great and powerful, among those in which permanent investments should be made. By his comparison, therefore, the hon. Member did not show that the Stocks of those communities should be included in trusts. Allusion had been made to another difficulty with regard to Colonial Stocks—namely, that we had no control over them. That was certainly a very strong objection to dealing with these Stocks in the manner suggested. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had said that we had only a shadowy control over the finances of India, but we had a much greater control over the finances of India than over those of our Colonies. The finances of India were administered by a Secretary of State and under the control of the Imperial Government. While he hoped that it would be long before the ties between us and any of our Colonies were severed, it was clear that those ties were not of the same character as those which bound us to India. We had no control, for instance, over the finances of Australia; we could not limit their issues in any degree. What Government would venture to veto any financial proposal made by one of our self-governing Colonies? They were asked to put on the same footing with securities now included in trusts funds which were well deserving of credit, but over which that House had absolutely no control, and to vary trusts in order to do this was a step far in advance of anything which they had yet done. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that in any case they might make mistakes, and he had shown that securities had been included in trust investments which could become dangerous, such as mortgages on land, which had been deemed a safe security at one time. But there were two inferences which might be drawn from this; on the one hand, they might give up the idea of placing a definite limit on trust investments because they were not far-seeing enough; but, on the other hand, they might confine their trust securities to those with regard to which they had absolute confidence that they would be safe in all conditions. They had such absolute confidence with regard to British Funds; but, in spite of their belief in the Colonies, they had scarcely advanced so far that their Stocks could be put on entirely the same footing. They should be careful before they widened the area of those securities which ought to be included in trusts. There were two other objections which had been raised. One was that it would not be possible to sue the Colonies; and the other was that we had no control over the amount of issues. They had been told that they were to be able to sue the Agent General of a Colony in this country; but if there were to be such a thing as a repudiation, he did not expect that there would be such assets with the Agent General in this country as would afford much security in such disappointing circumstances. He thought that, at all events, there should be simultaneous action on the part of the Colonies, and that the Colonies should agree to propose means to enable the holders of their Stock to sue. With regard to any power of limitation of the issues of the Colonies, his hon. Friend had almost given up that question; nor, indeed, was it desirable that their issues should be limited so long as they were employed in remunerative and excellent work. He placed before the House in no dogmatic spirit these considerations, which, at all events, ought to be present to their minds before they advanced on the road suggested by the hon. Member. He had not said one word which was disparaging to the credit of our Colonies, or wanting in sympathy for their development, both financial and industrial. He felt to the full what had been said by the hon. Member, that the fact of this country, as far as possible, assisting the Colonies by its Money Market was a circumstance which would contribute to the maintenance of the bonds which existed between them and this country. But sometimes, when the Colonies were irritated—and they were irritated at causes which we occasionally thought somewhat slight—at those moments they were apt to forget the advantages which they derived from their connection with the Mother Country. Although their high credit was due in the main to their industry, good management, and business-like qualities, on the other hand, he believed that it was also largely due to the fact that they were able to come as Colonists and fellow-subjects to the London Money Market, and to find greater facilities and greater readiness to lend than they would find in any other Money Market in Europe, or than they would find if they were to cut themselves adrift and to become independent communities. Reference had been made to the extraordinarily low rate of interest at which Canada had lately been able to borrow money; but he had the highest authority for saying that that was in part due to the conversion which had lately taken place, and to the fact that the rate of interest had been generally lowered. What had taken place with regard to Imperial Funds had reacted on others, and Canada had thus derived great support from what had taken place with regard to the National Debt of this country. He thought it would prove extremely agreeable to the Colonies that this Motion had been brought forward, and he hoped that they would be gratified by the tone of the debate. He trusted, especially as the Motion did not suggest any practical steps and was simply an abstract proposition, that it would be withdrawn, and not pressed to a Division.

BARON DIMSDALE (Herts, Hitchin), in supporting the Resolution, said, he thought it very desirable that the powers of trustees should be enlarged, that they should not be limited and confined, as they now were, to the old funds, but, where it was advisable, they should have an opportunity of investing in these new trusts.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR (Leicester) said, that, as he had spent many years in the Australian Colonies, he desired to say one or two words. The Australian Colonies and the House had every right to be thankful to the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool (Sir George Baden-Powell) for bringing this question forward. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had very properly said they were all satisfied as to the security offered by the Colonies for any investments of this kind. He (Mr. A. M'Arthur) was frequently asked by persons as to the Colonial Securities, and his invariable answer was that they were quite as good and safe as the Bank of England. It had been said we had not yet touched the bottom of the Australian Colonies. He thought we had scarcely touched the surface of them. There was an amount of mineral and vegetable wealth in those Colonies which it was almost impossible to exaggerate. While he admitted the truth of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Colonies owed much to this country, this country owed a very great deal to the Colonies for the outlet for English capital which they afforded. He had great pleasure in supporting the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, the adoption of whose suggestions would be of great benefit to this country and the Colonies.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcestershire, Evesham) said, he rose for the purpose of rectifying a mistake which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) appeared to have made. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the finances of India were really not under the control of the House of Commons. When that statement was very justly challenged by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said that, at all events, the control was shadowy. He begged the right hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon; the control was real. He assured the House that the Indian finances, from beginning to end, from top to bottom, in general and in detail, were under the fullest control of the Secretary of State, who was, as a Minister of the Crown, responsible to this House. Certainly, India had an interest slightly adverse to the Resolution of his hon. Friend the Member for he Kirkdale Division of Liverpool (Sir George Baden-Powell), because the investing in Colonial securities would pro tanto divert capitalists from the Indian securities pertaining to railways and canals in India. Still, we were bound to consider the interests of England also. Now, of late, English investments had been narrowed—landed securities had been inevitably depreciated, and now, by the recently successful operations of Government, even Consols were less valuable to investors than they were. Therefore, we must look further afield to our Colonies; and, having regard to the prosperous case arrayed by his hon. Friend's statistics, he must admit the Resolution was worthy of acceptance in Indian circles and in all other circles.

MR. EVANS (Southampton) said, he rose to address the House for the first time with great deference, because he felt that his want of knowledge of the formalities of the House might cause him to transgress some of them. When he came down to the House he had no intention whatever of taking part in the debate, and he only rose to do so because, when he read the Resolution of the hon. Member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool, he interpreted it to mean that the hon. Gentleman asked authority for trustees to invest their trust funds in Colonial Securities. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had placed a somewhat different interpretation upon the Resolution, and, therefore, he hoped the hon. Member for Kirkdale would state the exact meaning of his Resolution. If the Resolution meant, as he supposed it did, that trustees should have the right to invest their trust funds in Colonial Government Securities when no such direct authority was given in the trust, he should oppose the Resolution to the very last. Under such circumstances, he should be sorry, in the first place, for the beneficiaries under the trust, in the second place for the Colonists themselves, and in the third place for the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had intimated that there was a danger which was certainly familiar to him (Mr. Evans), and which must be familiar to all those who knew Colonial Governments well—there was a danger which arose from the facilities to borrow.

Sir Richard Temple

There were connected with the Colonial Governments, as there were in this country and in every country, a certain set of people who loved to borrow money without any thought as to the way they were to expend it. He was familiar with several of the Colonies of this country, perhaps more familiar than most hon. Members of the House of Commons, and he knew from experience that loans were obtained without any clear understanding as to the way in which the money was to be expended. Many loans were not originated as they ought to be—for some great exploit or some great expansion of the country for which the money was borrowed. They often originated in the wish of certain financiers to borrow first, and find the means of spending the money afterwards. If the hon. Member for Kirkdale proposed this Resolution with the view of the investment of trust funds in the way he (Mr. Evans) had described, it would be necessary that the debate should be carried on much longer, in order to show—certainly he would undertake to show—the many fallacies in the hon. Gentleman's statement. The hon. Gentleman had referred to market price; but market price was something by which no one ought to be guided. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of the United States Four per Cents being at £29 premium. Within the last 20 years he (Mr. Evans) had bought that Stock at 62 discount. How could they take that as a proof of the value of Colonial Securities? It was utterly fallacious. Again, it was necessary to draw the attention of the House to the fact that all these improvements in the Colonies were really commercial enterprises. If they applied the test of the Market, the lenders of money could well examine the enterprises, and if they found them worthy of support they would lend the money at a fair rate. If, however, the promoters could turn to trustees—the majority of whom were quite unable to investigate the securities, and quite unable to form an opinion whether the securities were good or not—they would have the trustees trying to persuade the Colonists to borrow their money. When the Colonists had borrowed the money they would try to spend it in some way or other, a proceeding unlikely to result favourably for either party. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had gone so completely over the ground that he would not further trespass upon the patience of the House.

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon) said, that if the House would allow him, he would like to make one or two remarks upon the subject under discussion. He was very much indebted to his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkdale (Sir George Baden-Powell) for having called the attention of the House to the question, and although he (Mr. Gray) appreciated all the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said as to the necessity of treating with the greatest care the powers given to trustees, he desired to point out that there was another side to the question, and that was the question of the interest of the annuitants. At the present time land was looked upon somewhat suspiciously as an investment, and although the Conversion Scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be said to have been brought to a successful issue, there were many people in England who felt that that Scheme had not been an altogether brilliant piece of legislation for them. He alluded now, of course, to the annuitants. He had heard from many annuitants that their incomes had been so reduced by the Conversion Scheme that they found it was very difficult to make ends meet. There was one class of annuitants who had felt the Conversion Scheme more severely, perhaps, than any others, and they were the annuitants who received their incomes from Chancery held property. It seemed to him very hard that the law should say to these people—"You must invest your money in the Court of Chancery," and that that should be supplemented by legislation, which said—"and we will give you just what we like for your money." He hoped that although the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not prepared to accept the Resolution of the hon. Member for Kirkdale, the right hon. Gentleman would consider the question and deal with it before long, perhaps in a modified form.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, he only rose in consequence of the very extraordinary declaration of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Evesham Division of Worcester (Sir Richard Temple) that the House of Commons had complete control over the finances of India from top to bottom. As far as his experience went, the only opportunity they had of even alluding to the finances of India was the opportunity afforded by the introduction of the Indian Budget. That Budget was generally introduced when the rest of the Business of the House was disposed of, and when the House was comparatively empty. It was not true that they had an opportunity of dealing with the Secretary of State for India as they had of dealing with other Secretaries of State, because his salary did not appear in the Estimates. The control which Parliament exercised over the finances of India was really limited to the risk of the ballot.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL said, he had a difficulty to find anything to reply to, because all that had been said substantially supported his Resolution. The only objection urged against automatic regulation was that there was no security against a fall in value; but all Funds were liable to fall in value, and therefore the objection was not specially applicable to Colonial Securities. He wished to see legislation which should include such securities and enable trustees to invest money in securities which were not as yet open to trustees; but he supposed the legislation would not be retrogressive and would not affect existing trusts. He thought the House was with him, and therefore he asked leave not to press the Resolution to a Division.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) said, he did not think such a conclusion would be at all satisfactory. It was an extraordinary thing, if the House were in favour of the Resolution, to suggest that it should be withdrawn. He had moved a similar Amendment to the Budget, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) then said that the proposal should be favourably considered by the Government and facilities given for legislation this Session. He understood that a Bill had been introduced into the other House, and that the Prime Minister had assented to the principle of this Resolution. He did not think the Resolution should be withdrawn, except upon the understanding that there would be legislation this Session.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen) (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, that accepting the hon. Member's interpretation of his own Resolution, that it was not to involve the setting aside of trusts, it would be better to withdraw it in view of the legislation pending in "another place."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ECCLESIASTICAL ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND).—RESOLUTION.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.), in rising to call attention to the assessment of property in Scotland for ecclesiastical purposes; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient that Assessments for Ecclesiastical purposes in Scotland should be maintained, and that in lieu thereof an equivalent annual assessment ought to be made for assisting Secondary Education in Scotland," said, he might best explain the subject to English Members by saying that the nearest parallel which he could find to it was the controversy that some years ago excited great interest in this country—namely, Church rates. It might be asked how, in Scotland, where the friends of religious equality and the supporters of the Liberal Party were stronger than in England, there should be any question of Church rates so long after the question had been settled in England; and, in mentioning this, he pointed out that the question was settled in England without involving the larger question of Disestablishment. The reason why Church rates continued in Scotland was that, while in England they were paid by the occupier, in Scotland they were paid by the owner of land. In Scotland the payments for ecclesiastical purposes were a hereditary burden upon land; and he was obliged to the hon. Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities, who had given Notice of his intention to move an Amendment to the Motion. While the Motion involved two very different propositions—each of which he ought to be in a position to prove—one of those propositions had been removed by the hon. Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities, who stated in the Amendment of which he had given Notice that these assessments "had been a burden upon land from time immemorial." There were four obligations imposed by the old Statutes of Scotland on the owners of land—namely, (1) to build and maintain churches; (2) to build and maintain manses in the rural districts; (3) to provide churchyards; and (4) to provide schools and pay the schoolmasters. All these obligations had, for the last 300 years, been a first charge upon land in Scotland, and they partook rather of the nature of tithes than rates. There was a difference between the position of the larger burghs in Scotland and rural districts in respect of these assessments. In the large burghs the question was so bound up with other questions connected with the Established Church that they could scarcely be disentangled; but in the rural districts the question was totally distinct, and the obligation was totally distinct. It was not possible for him to give the House the exact amount of these assessments, because the Returns were not complete; but, from 1879-80, they had continuous Returns for seven years, and he found that in the rural districts, and in the districts partly rural and partly urban, the amount registered for these assessments during the seven years was £406,741, or an average of £58,100 a-year. That was a very large sum—much larger than would be spent if those who used the churches had to provide the money themselves. Inasmuch as the clergy themselves in their Presbyteries were the authority that determined how much money should be spent, he need hardly say that they charged on a princely and liberal scale. Therefore, the amount raised was extravagant. The first objection to this hereditary burden was that the demands made upon the landlords were beyond the requirements of the case. In the second place, these burdens were of a peculiarly irritating character, because they were most irregular in their incidence. Sometimes 10 years elapsed and no demand was made upon the heritors, and then suddenly £2,000 or £3,000 might be demanded in a single year. He was aware that in 1862 an Act was passed mitigating the inconvenience of this assessment by providing that in the case of new churches the expenditure might be spread over a period of 10 years. There was another grievance which was felt very much in the small towns and villages of Scotland—namely, that the feuars had been held liable for this species of assessment. Many of these feuars were comparatively poor, and there could be no doubt that, although under Scotch law they were liable, it had been felt by the landlords themselves in most parts of Scotland that it was a hardship to charge any of this assessment upon the feuars. In the Amendment of which the hon. Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities had given Notice, he was not quite right in suggesting that those assessments were for churches alone. They were, as he had said, for manse, and for churchyards as well. It was upon the fact that these burdens were of a hereditary and of an ancient character that he based his argument that, whatever was to be done with the proceeds of these assessments, they were a burden upon the landlord from which he ought not to be relieved. The landlord, at all events, had no claim on any portion of this assessment, whatever was to be done with it. The question between the hon. Member and himself was not one of relief to landlords, but one as to the uses to which this money should be applied. What he would ask the House to do was to declare that, instead of this irregular and somewhat vexatious use, the assessment ought to be employed for the purposes of secondary or technical education in Scotland. He was glad to find, from the Amendment of which Notice had been given by his hon. Friend, that he would not deny that, if this money was to be applied towards any secular purpose, there was none more deserving than that of secondary or technical education in the rural districts of Scotland. A sum of £50,000 a-year would probably go far to supply the deficiencies of the rural districts in Scotland in regard to these two branches of education, because he might remind the House that the large towns would have no large claim—or, perhaps, no claim at all—on the fund. The whole of this money would be available for the development of secondary and technical education in the rural districts of Scotland. Supposing this contribution were converted into an annual assessment, would it be a serious imposition on the landlords? He was not in a position to give the exact figures to the House, because there was a lack of accurate information as to the distribution of this burden; but he found that the valuation roll of the rural districts in Scotland amounted to £12,000,000, and, at 1*d.* in the pound, that would give £50,000. It was probable that the assessment required to be imposed in view of this burden might not exceed 1*d.* in the pound—that was to say, that a landlord deriving an annual income of £1,200 would only be called upon to contribute £5 a-year. This would not be any serious burden on the landlords, and it would be a relief from an irregular and obnoxious tax. Now, with regard to the purposes to which this money should be applied. The hon. Member contended in his Amendment that this money should be applied to the purposes to which it was at the present moment applied. This was a tax upon land, and he (Mr. Hunter) contended that the product of a tax was the property of the people, and he altogether denied that it was right that the property of the community should be devoted to the maintenance of one of the numerous religious denominations into which Scotland was divided. There was a time in the history of Scotland when this tax was imposed—there was a time when there was so much religious unity in Scotland—so much unity of worship—that it was right and reasonable that the maintenance of the churches, as the maintenance of schools, should be parochial burdens. But everyone who was acquainted with the history of the Church of Scotland knew that by a series of successive secessions there remained now only a small part of that which was once the whole Church of Scotland, and it was totally inconsistent with the principle of religious equality—inconsistent with the principle of equal rights—that the property which belonged to all should be applied exclusively for the benefit of a few. It might be said that the Church of Scotland would be put to some inconvenience by the withdrawal of this money. But it would be in no worse position than any other of the denominations. Besides, nothing would be so beneficial to that Church as to be compelled to rely for repairs to places of worship and other such expenditure upon the Christian liberality of its people; and, by accustoming themselves to support the religious ordinances of their own Churches, they would be preparing themselves for the inevitable time when the connection between Church and State must entirely cease. Only a small addition would be made to the claims on members of the Church if this source of revenue was removed, and a great and lasting benefit would be conferred on the cause of secondary and technical education, which the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Amendment himself would recognize had the best claim to this fund if it were to be devoted to secular purposes. For these reasons, he begged to submit the Resolution which stood in his name for the consideration of the House.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient that Assessments for Ecclesiastical purposes in Scotland should be maintained, and that in lieu thereof an equivalent annual assessment ought to be made for assisting Secondary Education in Scotland."—(Mr. Hunter.)

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities), in rising to move as an Amendment—

"That as the Ecclesiastical Assessments have been a burden upon land from time immemorial for the erection and repair of church buildings in the old parishes of Scotland, this House, in the absence of any grievance connected therewith, except in the case of feuars, for whose relief a Bill is now before Parliament, declines to entertain a proposal to alienate these assessments to secular uses," said, that the hon. Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) was right in presuming that he did not find any fault whatever with the object to which the hon. Member would apply this money, so far as regarded that object itself. He had no objection to secondary or technical schools; but he did object to the proposal that these should be assisted with money intended for an altogether different purpose. These assessments had existed for three centuries. They represented a burden upon the land of Scotland, which was expressly recognized and thoroughly understood by every landowner whenever any property was bought or sold. This burden was taken into account in the price given for properties, so that it was really no burden upon the landowner, but a trust which he held for the Church. The expression "church buildings" in the Amendment was meant to have a general reference to manse and glebes as well as to churches. The Church rates of England, which were dealt with by legislation some years ago, were not at all of the same nature as these ecclesiastical assessments in Scotland. The Church rates were imposed by the votes of the occupants of a parish; but the Church of England had no property in these rates. In Scotland, on the other hand, the churches, manse, and glebes which were maintained by these assessments were the property of the heritors who paid the assessments, and the assessments were the recognized endowments of the Church, not depending in any way upon the vote of the parish. This, no doubt, was an important question for the rural districts, for it was difficult to see how the churches and manse could be maintained in some parts of Scotland if this statutory provision was withdrawn. From the very nature of the case the burden must be irregular in its incidence, as it was not every day that repairs were wanted, or that a new church was required in substitution of the old one; and it would, therefore, be very difficult to substitute an equivalent yearly assessment for this burden. There was no grievance beyond that admitted in the Amendment with respect to that class of heritors who were known as feuars. There was a peculiarity in their case, and there was a Bill now before Parliament to relieve these feuars of their acknowledged grievance. While they were an extremely numerous class, their proportion of the total amount of the assessments was very small, and from an analysis of typical districts of Scotland, including three divisions of Lanarkshire, the counties of Perth, Mid Lothian, and Roxburgh, it was found that though these feuars were 77 per cent of the number of heritors, the amount of assessments paid by them was only 13·7 per cent of the whole; so that while there might be some grievance as to 14 per cent of the assessments, which it was proposed to remedy, there remained 86 per cent of the assessments, as to which there was no ground of complaint. But the real meaning of the Motion was shown by the hon. Member (Mr. Hunter), for he diverged from ecclesiastical assessments to the question of Disestablishment and Disendowment. This Motion was really a proposal for a measure of Disendowment. He thought this was scarcely the opportunity for entering into the larger question of Disestablishment and Disendowment, especially when there was a Motion on the Paper for Friday night which would definitely raise it. He would only say that while it might be argued that the Church of Scotland was only a part of what it formerly was, and while it could not be denied that there had been important secessions, the hon. Member omitted to say that the Church of Scotland was still a growing Church, stronger at this moment than ever before, and embracing within its borders as large a number of people as all the other Presbyterian Churches in Scotland put together. These matters might be considered beside the question, but what he would submit to the House was that an arrangement which had been in existence for 300 years ought not to be hastily set aside, and that they ought not now, for the sake of secondary education or technical schools, to disendow, to some extent, the National Church of Scotland. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

SIR CHARLES DALRYMPLE (Ipswich), in seconding the Amendment, said, he had listened with considerable interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, and he must say that he had seldom heard a weaker advocacy of a great change. And, as if to give a greater air of unreality to the proceeding, the Motion was seconded by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Firth), whose acquaintance with the ecclesiastical affairs of Scotland must be of a very recent date. He recognized in the speech a movement in favour of Disendowment, and one reason given by the Mover of the Motion was that Church rates in England had been abolished. But he almost immediately stated that Church rates in England and Church assessments in Scotland were a totally different thing. Then he (Sir Charles Dalrymple) had always been under the impression that the amount derived from Church assessments in Scotland was very small; and he thought even £58,000 was so modest a sum to be derived from that source that it was hardly worth the hon. Member's while to covet it. No doubt a laudable motive lay at the root of the Motion. It was to find funds for secondary education in Scotland. In that desire they all sympathized; but he wished that the hon. Member had looked elsewhere in order to satisfy his very laudable desire. He ventured to say that there was no grievance whatever connected with the ecclesiastical assessments in the old parishes of Scotland, and if there was a grievance in the case of the feuars, it was not the fault of those who sat on the Ministerial side of the House that it had not been remedied before the present time. He would like to know whether the hon. Member (Mr. Hunter) had any authority to speak for these feuars, and whether they would be prepared to give an equivalent annual assessment for secondary and technical education?

MR. HUNTER, interrupting, said, he expressly stated that he thought the assessment ought not to be borne by the feuars.

SIR CHARLES DALRYMPLE said, that the Amendment of his hon. Friend expressly stated that it was in contemplation to relieve the feuars from ecclesiastical assessment, as they alone had a grievance on the subject. His hon. Friend had dealt fully with the subject, and he would therefore content himself with saying that the Church of Scotland now needed endowments more than it had ever done, because it was doing more work than it had accomplished in past years.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as the Ecclesiastical Assessments have been a burden upon land from time immemorial for the erection and repair of church buildings in the old parishes of Scotland, this House, in the absence of any grievance connected therewith, except in the case of feuars, for whose relief a Bill is now before Parliament, declines to entertain a proposal to alienate these assessments to secular uses."—(Mr. James Campbell.)

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT (Roxburgh) said, he was anxious to support the Motion before the House. He was bound to say it appeared to him a little unnecessary to recall to Members of the House exactly what was the object and purpose of the system of ecclesiastical assessments now existing in Scotland. The fact was that the Scottish Established Church differed from all other Churches in the United Kingdom, established or free, in this—that a special provision was made by law for the repair of the churches and buildings of the Establishment and of the manses of the clergy. That was a state of things which he maintained did not exist as regarded the Established Church of England, and did not exist as regarded the Disestablished Church, now the Voluntary Church in Ireland, and did not exist in regard to any other religious denomination whatever in the United Kingdom. The state of things which they now impugned as regarded the Scottish Establishment had existed in former days as regarded the Established Church in England, because provision was at that time made by law in England for the support of the fabrics of the Established Church. That state of things, however, could not exist in conformity with the state of opinion which began to rule in this country a generation ago; and he thought it incumbent upon those hon. Gentlemen who supported the existing state of things to justify the exception. What they had to show was the right and title of the Scottish Establishment to enjoy an advantage which was not enjoyed by any other Church, established or disestablished, in the land, and he maintained that neither the hon. Gentleman who moved nor the hon. Baronet who seconded the Amendment which had just been put had, in the slightest degree, justified to the House the special position in which the Church of Scotland stood. He knew that an attempt had been made to draw a distinction between Church rates in England and the provision made for the Established Church in Scotland; but, after all, the distinction was a skin-deep one. By law a provision was made for the support of the Church fabric in England, and by law a provision was made for the support of the Church fabric and the ministers' houses in Scotland. It was true that in England, following the universal plan, the rates were levied on the occupiers, and that in Scotland, following the almost universal plan in that country, the money was raised not by a rate on the occupier, but by a charge on the owners of the land, but these were merely matters as to the way in which the money was raised. As to the fundamental principle, the question was, whether by law they should raise out of the land provision for one denomination—whether that which existed in Scotland now, which was a parallel to that which existed in England before the compulsory Church rates were abolished, should continue? It was only natural that there should have been some allusion to the fact that this matter was no new thing in this House, and in this country, as regarded the ecclesiastical assessment question in Scotland. This matter had been before the House several times, and what had happened? The House had on two occasions, if not oftener, resolved in condemnation of the continuation of the principle of the ecclesiastical system in Scotland. They had decided the matter upon a Bill which was brought forward year after year for the abolition of the ecclesiastical assessments in Scotland. Hon. Members had resolved in that House, by a considerable majority, that that system should not exist, and they had resolved again on a separate occasion—and that as lately as 1884—on a Resolution he himself had brought forward in opposition to a Bill promoted, he thought, by the hon. Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. J. A. Campbell). He himself had brought forward, on the second reading of the Bill to which he had referred, a Motion almost substantially the same as that put before the House that night, which Motion amounted to this—that it was contrary to public policy at the present moment that a special provision should be made by law for raising out of the national resources a fund for the maintenance of any special denomination in the country. That was the broad principle on which he stood, and he wished to put that view strongly before hon. and right hon. Gentlemen that night. He knew that in days gone by it would have been hopeless to appeal to the Conservative Party on such a topic as this; but he knew that now things had changed, and that there were men on the other side of the House who, on this question, were as Liberal in every sense of the word as hon. Gentlemen who sat on that (the Opposition) side, and he asked them to consider what justification could there be for making a special provision for a favoured denomination that was established? When the hon. Member for the Glasgow University said that the Church of Scotland was a thriving Church, and when somebody else said that in the main as to free quarters and resources the Church of Scotland depended now, as other Churches did, on the enthusiasm, the love, and the voluntary assistance of its members. Then he said he thought all that, which he believed to be thoroughly true, rebounded against the argument they were now setting before the House. He maintained that it was beneath the dignity of the Church of Scotland, the National Church, looking at the sympathy which a great body of the people had always felt towards it, to come to the State to ask it to repair its own fabrics and enlarge the houses of its ministers, spending upon it a sum which, after all, throughout the length and breadth of Scotland, amounted to no more than £40,000 a-year. But, at any rate, if hon. Members had looked at statistics in this matter, and had looked at the Returns moved for in 1881 by Lord Balfour, and by hon. Members in this House, they would see how unreasonable it was to suppose that it was in any way necessary for a popular Church to have any such assistance as this. It evinced no animosity on the part of anyone towards the Church of Scotland to show that this was an invidious law. He believed there were many thousands, nay, he knew there were hundreds of thousands of members of the Church of Scotland who were almost ashamed to claim such a privilege as this when they knew that they, as well as the Free Church, and as well as various other Churches in Scotland, could trust to the voluntary efforts of their members to keep their fabrics in repair, to build new school houses when required, and to support the houses of the Scottish ministry. This question was, he knew, a question of principle, and he knew it might be said that it was, to a certain extent, a question of religious endowment. It was a question, there was no dispute about it, as to whether it would not be more expedient and more just to ask those who were new Members and who supported that particular denomination to carry out, at all events, the every-day expenses of the Establishment. He had no hesitation in saying that it would be more just and more expedient, and that it would cause no injury whatever to the Church. He did not wish now to enter upon other matters which were, no doubt, more or less remotely connected with that with which they were now dealing, which matters would come before them more properly next Friday; but it was hardly possible to pass over, on such an occasion as this, the fact that in many parts of Scotland—in the Highlands of Scotland particularly—they were imposing a parochial rate upon the parishes, and imposing a rate to support an Established Church and the manse of its ministers, when, as a matter of fact, the worshippers of the congregations were so few as hardly to need any consideration; he meant to say that where they had a parish containing a population of some thousands, and where the communicants of the Established Church were only some six or seven, it was absurd by law to make provision to keep up the fabric and the manse. It was absurd to make this provision, when the whole population, practically speaking, went to a church where precisely the same religion was to be found administered by the same class of ministers, and where a precisely similar system of worship was maintained by voluntary effort. This was a matter he wished to press very strongly not only on that (the Opposition), but also on the Government side of the House. He thought hon. Members opposite should acquaint themselves with these matters, and he did think that it would be a thing to be deeply deplored—seeing that Conservative Members had now arrived on this question at a more advanced position than they had ever previously attained to, and looking at, to use a Scottishism, their recidal from the old position they used to occupy—if now for the first time for many years they should decide in favour of a principle which had been abandoned in regard to the Church of England. He asked the Members of the Government to consider these matters, and to think very seriously indeed before they went back behind the decisions of the Parliament of 1870, and even behind those of the Parliament of 1874, when the then Lord Advocate in a Conservative Ministry induced an hon. Member to withdraw a Bill for the abolition of the Church rate by stating that the Government themselves were dealing with this subject. He thought that, so far as the earlier part of the Resolution went, the hon. Gentleman who moved it was perfectly right in saying that this provision should not any longer be made for the advantage of a special religious denomination in Scotland, and he (Mr. A. R. D. Elliot) thought, further, that the hon. Member was perfectly right in saying, or implying by his Motion, that the landlords had no right to appropriate to themselves the funds which had hitherto been appropriated to what had been considered a public purpose. But he did think it doubtful whether the House of Commons ought now to resolve that the proper purpose to which to devote these national funds was secondary education in the country. He did not feel that that was the right way to deal with the matter. It might be the right way, but that seemed to him to be a subject for subsequent and separate consideration. It must be remembered that these were parochial funds, and did not belong to the Church at large or to the country at large, but belonged separately to each parish. He doubted very much indeed whether they ought now to pledge themselves in the House of Commons to saying that a fair method of dealing with these funds was to devote them to the purpose of secondary education; but as regarded the main principles of the Motion he was thoroughly in accord with his hon. Friend's view, and could only say that if he would withdraw that portion which invited the House to make a certain application of these funds, he should have no hesitation whatever in going into the Lobby with him in support of his proposal.

SIR ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL (Renfrew, W.) said, he was obliged to the hon. and learned Member for Roxburgh (Mr. A. R. D. Elliot) for having made a Disestablishment speech on this occasion. The hon. and learned Member had evidently anticipated the delivery of a speech he was about to make on a future occasion, and he (Sir Archibald Campbell) was much obliged to him for having told the House his views on the question of all endowments. But when he came to look at the Motion moved by the hon. Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) he found that, at all events, he recognized the justice of the assessments not only to the owners, but also to the feuars, for in his speech he told them, from the commencement to the end, that he proposed to appropriate the money now given to the Church of Scotland to other purposes—for what he called secondary education. Now, so far as secondary education was concerned, he (Sir Archibald Campbell), for one, would be very glad to see that given to Scotland; but he should be sorry to see it done at the expense of the higher education given by the Church, that education without which, as they all knew, all other education was of no worth at all. The speech of the hon. and learned Member for Roxburgh was a remarkable one; the hon. and learned Member had the courage of his opinions; but surely he must know and must feel that it was not altogether right that endowments which were admitted to be just, which were admitted to be right, and which it was admitted that the land ought to pay, and which it was admitted were devoted to a good purpose—for no one could say that they had not been devoted to a good purpose—should be taken away for another purpose. He must say he admired the hon. and learned Member's courage extremely on this occasion. Let them consider, for one moment, the way in which these assessments were made. They had been told by the hon. Member for North Aberdeen that they were often very excessive; that they were more than the Presbyters were entitled to, and were very much more than were needed. Well, at all events—as he (Sir Archibald Campbell) had something to do with the rural part of Scotland—he knew perfectly well this—that every one of these propositions for assessment, when they came to the Presbyteries, had to pass through the hands of the heritors, and were carefully scanned by skilled men. Everything that was done for the Church was carefully looked into, and not one farthing more than was necessary was paid for the work. He did not think that, whatever might be the sum annually charged for the maintenance of the Church, the assessment upon the land could ever be called excessive, because it was carefully looked into by those men who had to pay it; and, at all events, his countrymen might claim credit for this—that they were not in the habit of paying more money for a thing than there was absolute necessity for. Then, another point was, was there any cause for this proposed change? Well, in 1885, when he had the honour to contest the county which he represented, the election turned largely upon the question of Disestablishment, and he might say that, during the whole of that time, no question ever cropped up in reference to these assessments. He knew perfectly well that there was a grievance with regard to the feuars, but that grievance had always been met by hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House; and the delay which had been caused in getting rid of that grievance had been owing more to the opposite side of the House than to that (the Ministerial) side. All he could say was that they would have heard plenty on this subject in his contest had there really been any crying grievance in the matter. But what were the real facts of the case? Why, he was supported quite as much by those who belonged to other Churches in his position as regarded the Established Church of Scotland as by those who were communicants of the Church itself. The most valuable support he received, and some of the best men who assisted him as chairmen of his committees, were gentlemen who belonged to other Churches. He could assure the House that there was very little jealousy indeed amongst the laity on either side, whether they belonged to the Established Church, the Free Church, or the United Presbyterian Church. He believed that the question was used for political purposes by those who held certain political views—they had hit on this particular grievance, though there was no movement in Scotland in favour of its being brought up on this occasion. He was sure of this, however—that if it were desired to take away the property of the Church in Scotland and deliver it over for the benefit of some secular project, they would find a feeling roused in that country which would not be easily allayed by such speeches of that of the hon. Member for North Aberdeen.

MR. HALDANE (Haddington) said, it was with much satisfaction that he had listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Roxburgh (Mr. A. R. D. Elliot), and he must say that the speech which followed it from the hon. Baronet the Member for West Renfrew (Sir Archibald Campbell) bore out a belief which many of them on that (the Opposition) side of the House had held for some time. Whenever his hon. Friends, and that majority of Scottish Liberal Members with whom he was associated, took up an attitude in the least in advance of that which was adopted amongst hon. Gentlemen opposite, they heard a loud and violent protest, and found the opinions of the hon. and learned Member for Roxburgh promptly repudiated by the hon. Baronet the Member for West Renfrew. They knew that the opinions of the hon. and learned Member for Roxburgh were not those of the hon. Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities (Mr. J. A. Campbell), and they knew that these were opinions which were distasteful in the sight of the hon. Baronet the Member for Ipswich (Sir Charles Dalrymple), and therefore they were face to face with this fact—that the appeals made to the Tory Party to advance and take up subjects which would really be popular in Scotland, such as the question of secondary education and Church reform, were appeals which were addressed to the deafest of deaf ears. There was an aspect of this question which was raised in the speeches of the three hon. Members opposite and who had addressed the House. They had told the House that these assessments were assessments which in some way or other might be looked upon as the property of the Church, and that it was robbery and spoliation to divert these endowments, which had been given to the Church by a legal title, from the purposes to which they had been destined, and they asked the House to look on this question not merely on the ground of that higher ecclesiastical education for which the hon. Baronet the Member for West Renfrew appealed, but also on the ground of the vested rights of property. He thought it was high time that in the House and outside the House those principles should be clearly recognized and defined on which for the future they were to approach the question of charitable endowments and the diversion of them to public purposes. There seemed to be a superstition that these charitable endowments and these particular properties were to be regarded as on the same footing as, or as having some analogy to, private property. He ventured to think that nothing was more plain than that there was not the smallest analogy between the two cases. When property was given to a corporate Body, such as the Church—the only justification for whose existence in a corporate capacity was that the public desired its maintenance—they were face to face with the fact that the public—in the present case the Scottish public—were the only parties concerned. The public were the beneficiaries for whom the endowments existed, and if the public chose to say that these endowments were to be diverted to some other purpose, then he should like to know who was entitled to complain. Certainly, no complaint could be put forward on the footing of the rights of property. Then the question remained as to what obligation they were really subject to. They had got thus far—he thought there was an obligation, and a binding obligation, which they must bear in mind in this matter. They must remember that, after all, they who administered these things were trustees not only for this generation, but for future generations. They must remember in diverting the Church property, or any other property, to be careful lest the purpose for which they did make that diversion was a purpose which benefited only the generation in which they lived, and they must see that it would be a purpose which would be recognized by those who came after them as a proper one to which to apply the property with which they were dealing. He (Mr. Haldane) supported most cordially the Motion of the hon. Member for North Aberdeen, because he recognized the purpose to which in his Motion he proposed to devote these assessments as one which future generations would support and approve of. Anyone who knew the state of feeling in Scotland, and who had observed the changes which had taken place in public opinion in that country, would know that the desire for Disestablishment had grown at such a pace that even now the Establishment was well-nigh at an end. The great majority of the Scottish Representatives were more or less pledged to principles of Disestablishment. Wherever they went in Scotland, even amongst Liberal Churchmen, they would find the same opinions prevailing, and they would find a tendency on the part of the people to recognize more and more clearly every day that the only reason which had hitherto withheld some of them from throwing in their lot with the Party of Disestablishment was that they did not wish to appear to set themselves in antagonism to the Establishment for ecclesiastical reasons; but whenever they came face to face with the wishes of the Scottish people, they found them saying that they did not desire the Church property and Church assessments applied to purposes which, after all, only concerned a small section of the community. Those who brought forward and supported this Motion did not propose to stop short without defining some kind of purpose to which these ecclesiastical assessments were to be applied. They did not want them to cease. They were not there for the purpose of asking the House to assent to the principle that they should make a present of the assessments to the landowners out of whose land they issued. The land was held subject to these burdens; and they wanted to see this property applied to purposes which commended themselves to the minds of the Scottish people; and it was because they found those purposes in education, and because there was no other purpose which they knew of which found popular support, that they were there to insist on the diversion of this property, which ought no longer to be held as at present, to the purposes pointed out in the Motion of his hon. Friend.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright), in supporting the Amendment, said that this Motion appeared to be a proposal for partial disendowment, and probably had been brought forward because its Mover thought that the opportunity on Friday night would not be sufficient to discuss the whole question of Disestablishment and Disendowment. He, therefore, now proposed to have Disendowment; and, no doubt, he (Dr. Cameron) would ask on Friday for Disestablishment. If such were their tactics, hon. Members opposite might do their worst. It was necessary for them to be always agitating the public mind on these questions, for unless they did so their seats would not be worth anything at the next Election. If hon. Gentlemen opposite would make the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church of Scotland the issue at the next General Election, the Conservative Members for Scotland would be returned in a much larger proportion than they were at present. Between this hon. and learned Member who had just spoken and himself there was upon the question a great gulf fixed. The hon. and learned Member regarded secondary education as of deep importance. So did he; but he regarded religious education as of more importance still. This proposal for secondary education would, no doubt, benefit the towns, but it would be but of small advantage to the country districts, which would lose the benefits of their endowments devoted to religious education. He altogether differed from the view that these funds should be diverted to purposes alien to the objects and wishes of the founders. Whether the Church of Scotland was disestablished or not, the people of Scotland would stand to it. He admitted the force of the remarks that had been made with regard to Highland parishes, and some reform in regard to these might be necessary, but the Church ought not be judged by exceptional circumstances. The Church of Scotland had as a whole done excellent work, and the parish schools had proved under her auspices most successful.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton) said, that this was really a debate of very limited scope. The question before the House was not that of the Disestablishment or Disendowment of the Church of Scotland. As to whether the people of Scotland would stand by the Established Church, that would be seen on Friday night, when the voice of their Representatives was asked. The House was now discussing a question on the principle of Church rates. In Ireland that question was settled 50 years ago in the way in which it was now sought to settle it in Scotland, and in England it was settled 20 years ago. The House had also voted on two occasions that the question should be similarly settled in Scotland. The question was simply this: While the members of the Free Church, the United Presbyterian Church, and the other voluntary Churches of Scotland built and repaired their own churches out of funds supplied by themselves, without asking anything from their neighbours, was it fair to expect the general community to go on contributing funds for the building and repairs of the churches of one particular denomination—namely, the Established Church? This Resolution was directed against a special ecclesiastical privilege, and did not touch the question of Disestablishment and Disendowment, and, as such, he trusted that every hon. Gentleman on his side of the House would vote for it. It had been said that as times were very bad the Church ought not to be called upon to surrender part of its existing advantages. But in bad times surely the first luxury which a person would wish to dispense with was the luxury of making a compulsory payment for the purpose of keeping up the Church buildings of a denomination to which he did not belong. He agreed that there was a marked difference between the English Church rates and ecclesiastical assessments. These rates were a burden upon the land, and the House would do very wrong, as the custodian of the national property, should it allow the charge to be simply remitted to the landlords. It had been said that the landlord in this matter held a trust for the Church, but he and those who thought with him believed that the landlord held a trust for the nation. He hoped that hon. Members would not be misled by the allusion in the Amendment of the hon. Member for the University of Aberdeen to remedial legislation in relief of those who suffered under these ecclesiastical assessments. All he would say about that Bill now was that he never saw a measure on which he should be more willing to move that it should be read that day three months. There were some names on the back of the Bill which he respected, and in which he had confidence; but there were others of which he would say that he liked not the security. The Bill was one of those aggressive measures which had been brought in from time to time not so much in the interests of the persons whom they were supposed to affect beneficially as for the purpose of injuring the voluntary Churches. He would be prepared to prove that when the proper time came. He trusted his hon. Friend would consider the advisability of slightly altering his Resolution. For his own part, he should be more than unwilling to vote for any Resolution which specifically appropriated any part of the funds that presently go to the maintenance of the Established Church of Scotland to any special purpose, and he hoped his hon. Friend would consent to put in some words which would imply that these assessments should be exchanged for an annual assessment to be levied for the purpose of benefiting the entire community. Perhaps words such as "for some unsectarian purpose in Scotland " would meet the wishes of everybody who would be inclined to vote for the Resolution ; and certainly by such a change he would, at any rate, lose no votes, except the votes of those who disagreed with the main object of the Resolution.

MR. HUNTER said, he would certainly agree to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, that the right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House had succeeded in doing what everybody else had studiously avoided—namely, in introducing the word "sectarian" into the debate. He thought it would have been well had the debate been allowed to proceed without the introduction of such an element ; but the right hon. Gentleman in the speech which he had made had plainly indicated that the object and intention of the Motion was to have the principle of Disendowment, so far as the Motion went, established by the vote of the House to-night. It was as plain as possible that the whole object and purpose of bringing forward this question on the present occasion was to have a reconnaissance in force with a view to the general engagement which was to follow on Friday. The right hon. Gentleman had also indicated his horror that the Bill had not been brought in for Party reasons, and that his confidence in his own Friends, whose names were on the back of the Bill, was shaken when he found them in the company of three such terrible Gentlemen as the Members for the Universities of Aberdeen and Glasgow, the Member for Peebles and Selkirk, and the Member for Kirkcudbright. He should have thought that when the names of the right hon. Gentleman's Friends were on the back of the Bill, he should have told them what he objected to in its contents.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (interrupting) said, he would not have been in Order in doing so, and would have been stopped.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD said, in that case the right hon. Gentleman should not have referred so pointedly to the outside of the Bill for the purpose of questioning what was in it, when he knew that if he had made any direct allusion to the contents he would not have been in Order. The hon. Member for Aberdeen was doubtless actuated by the best of motives in introducing his Amendment, because he told the House that the effect of his Motion, if carried, would be very good for the Church of Scotland. If, however, that were accepted as true by many Friends of his, it would probably not be a ground in their opinion for giving any support to the Motion at all ; and it had been brought out very clearly that the aim rather was to move in the general direction of Disestablishment and Disendowment. It had been clearly shown that there was no strongly expressed desire on the part of any substantial portion of the people of Scotland for applying these assessments as proposed by the Motion. The hon. and learned Member for Roxburgh had reminded the House that this question had been before it on several occasions, but he omitted to state that it then fell dead and had been dead ever since. It would be found that Mr. M'Laren on a previous occasion withdrew his Motion because he thought that people were becoming more in favour of Disestablishment. Everything showed that the people of Scotland had never in any way indicated the slightest interest in this matter. His hon. Friend behind him had stated that the question had never been raised in election contests, and his own experience in 1874, 1878, and 1880 was to the effect that the question of Church assessment had never on any single occasion been raised. To talk, therefore, of this question as one which was now agitating the public mind in Scotland was an extravagance. It was not a question raised by the people of Scotland ; it was a subject raised by politicians as a stalking-horse for another and a more important question. There was very good reason why the public of Scotland should take no interest in it. If the Church of Scotland were asking the State for money to rebuild churches and repair manse he could understand that the question should be raised. But such was not the case. These assessments had been devoted for hundreds of years to purposes of religion, and the Scottish people had never made any complaint. The fact that there was an admitted grievance on the part of the small feuars was an indication that there was no general grievance. No case had been mentioned in which the proprietors or any other than the small feuars had made the smallest complaint. The right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow contended that in these hard times the luxury of paying these assessments should be dispensed with. But it was not proposed by the Motion to abolish the assessments. On the contrary, secondary education was to be assisted out of the money to be drawn from these proprietors and feuars. The only people who were to have nothing to say to the disposal of this money were those from whom it was to be wrung. Nothing could more plainly show that this Motion was only a preliminary skirmish for another question. The money went in aid of a Church which inculcated and taught the same doctrines in morals and Christian faith as were held by the great mass of the population of Scotland, and if they were to devote it to secondary education they would do an act of the greatest injustice. Was it proposed that the poor districts, where secondary education could not reach, should continue to pay this assessment, and that the money should be applied to secondary education in the large towns? Anything more unjust could not be conceived. His hon. Friend had said that the demands made upon the landlords in respect to these assessments were extravagant and were peculiarly irritating because they were intermittent. He asked his hon. Friend whether he was a mandatory for the landlords of Scotland in order to tell the House what were their grievances in that matter. If the landlords of Scotland were selecting a person to act as their representative on that question he thought that they would put his hon. Friend down last on the list of those whom they would choose to speak for them. One hon. Member had spoken of those assessments as robbery and spoliation, but he would remind those who used that language of the words of a gentleman now in a distant country, Mr. Anderson, formerly Member for Glasgow, who, when that matter was discussed before, stated his reasons for voting against such a Resolution as the present, and declared "that it was not only wrong but very stupid, in his opinion, for the Dissenters to go in for that piece of Church robbery." He knew they were to have a great battle on Friday, and no one doubted that the question now before the House was practically embraced in that which was to be disposed of on Friday. Objection was taken to these assessments on the ground that Church rates had been abolished in England, but there was no analogy between the rates in England and these assessments in Scotland. In conclusion, he hoped that the House would reject the Resolution of his hon. Friend, which would lead to no practical result. When the real issue came to be fought it would be fought on the general question which was to be raised on Friday night. If hon. Gentlemen were satisfied, as they professed to be, that Scotland was with them on this question, then let them stick to the real fight, and not raise side issues of this kind.

MR. M'LAGAN (Linlithgow) said, the Resolution of the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) contained two distinct propositions. In the first place, it was proposed to abolish assessments for ecclesiastical purposes, and then follows a proposal to divert the assessments to a different purpose altogether. The first of these proposals was identical with that in the Bill introduced by the late Mr. M'Laren, whose object was the abolition of Church rates, and his Bill was drafted on the same lines as the Bill abolishing compulsory Church rates in England. The whole machinery was left the same as if the Church rates were in existence, but they were to be paid voluntarily, instead of compulsorily. He voted on every occasion for that Bill, and he did so for certain reasons; because he considered that ecclesiastical assessments in Scotland were most unjust to the feuars. He saw no way to remedy that, and therefore considered it his duty to take the best way of meeting it; but he had always qualified his vote by his opinion in favour of ecclesiastical assessments being capitalized for the Established Church, so far as there was an Established Church, and afterwards for any purpose Parliament might think proper. If the hon. Member for Aberdeen had directed his Motion solely to the abolition of Church rates, then he should have been bound in consistency to vote for it; but as in the second part his hon. Friend proposed to devote the rates to a different purpose, he must vote against the Resolution. He thought it right to make these remarks, else his action might be considered open to the charge of inconsistency.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, he did not know whether his hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter) was disposed to alter his Motion. He felt reluctant to pledge himself to the purpose to which the latter portion of the Motion would devote the fund, and he did not think it would be expedient to divide the House upon it now. The appropriation of the rates to one particular Church was a very irritating part of the Establishment, and he should be glad to get rid of that source of irritation; but if he voted with his hon. Friend, it would not be for the latter part of the Resolution.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.) said, he did not think the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) would be quite consistent if he were to vote for the first part of the Resolution—namely, that assessments of property for Church purposes should cease, seeing that he was quite willing to assent to the continuation of these assessments, provided they were voluntary. But the Resolution provided for absolute abolition. Whereas the hon. Member in former times consistently voted for voluntary rates as in England instead of compulsory, voting for the Resolution now would be voting for abolition altogether.

MR. HUNTER said, before the House went to a Division, he wished to say a word or two on the point that had been raised. In framing the Resolution, he was anxious to invite the attention of the House to the claims of secondary education in the rural districts of Scotland. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had entirely misapprehended the point when the right hon. Gentleman supposed he contemplated the application of funds derived from rural districts to towns. That was not his intention at all; towns were well able to look after themselves in the matter of secondary education, it was the rural districts he was desirous of helping in this matter. But having brought the matter to the notice of the House, he had no desire to make that an essential part of the Motion, and would, therefore, at once accept the proposal made. It was on the Amendment the House would now divide, and of course if that Amendment should be carried, it would be unnecessary to go any further; but if the Amendment should be defeated, he would suggest that words be introduced such as those proposed by the hon. Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities. Then, a word on the Amendment. It was a great mistake to say this was the Disestablishment Question. It was quite true that the Disestablishment Question included Church assessments; the greater includes the less, not the less the greater.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) said, that this form of putting the Question would shut out subsequent Amendments. Could not the first half of the Motion be put?

MR. SPEAKER: That is not possible; the Forms of the House will not admit of it.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 111; Noes, 148: Majority 37.

DR. CAMERON said, after the Division just taken, he should not, under ordinary circumstances, think it right to challenge a Division on the Amendment. But this was a reactionary Amendment; it was not merely an expression of opinion on a matter before the House, it was an expression of opinion, overturning previous Resolutions of the House in a most reactionary manner. It committed the House to a Bill many Members thought objectionable, and which had yet to be discussed. Indeed, he thought it might have been raised as a point of Order, whether a Resolution referring thus to a Bill before the House was exactly within the spirit—it was within the letter, no doubt—of Parliamentary Rules in regard to Bills and Resolutions? It was their duty, he thought, to divide against the Resolution, because it affirmed an altogether reactionary proposal; it was a Resolution, in fact, affirming the desirability of keeping up these assessments for the maintenance of the Church. These assessments had nothing to do with Disestablishment. They were abolished in England, and still the Church remained established; they were abolished in Ireland long before the question of Disestablishment was dealt with. It was, apart altogether from disestablishment, a grievance promised to be dealt with by the House in quite another fashion, and in regard to which Resolutions of quite an opposite character to this had repeatedly been adopted by the House. They could not accept this Resolution without taking a Division against it. He remembered the history of the question, and the late Mr. M'Laren's efforts to get the grievance abolished. It had been truly said that he gave up his efforts at last, because he perceived that there was a strong current of feeling in Scotland setting in in favour, not of dealing piecemeal with the removal of grievances, but towards remedying the great grievance in ecclesiastical matters by abolishing the connection between Church and State. At that time, the persons who opposed all reform in the matter were those hon. Members who had endeavoured to commit the House to an opinion on the Bill before the House referred to in the Resolution. He and his Friends were bound to express their protest against this Resolution by taking a vote against it. He hoped they would have a strong Division again it, for he was perfectly certain there must be a number of Members on either side who, while dissenting from the original Resolution, must find this was not at all to their taste.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD thought the hon. Member might have accepted the amended Resolution with his usual amiability. The reasons now given for pressing the Division were not the suggestions made against the Amendment when it was under debate.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.) said, he would not have intervened, and would have accepted the present proposal, if he had not been certain that the conclusion the House had just arrived at was not the conclusion of Scotch Votes, and no one was more aware of that than the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate. The right hon. and learned Gentleman must be much misinformed on the question of votes, if he was not aware on this matter that the opinion of Scotch Members had been weighed down by the influence of votes which he and his Government had been able to oppose to Scotch opinion. The hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow was perfectly consistent, and more than that it would have been dereliction of duty on his part if he had not insisted on another Division, to make it more clear to the people of Scotland that in that House it was not the voice of Scotland that was respected, but that it was by those on the other side of the House, and who were responsible for Government, that the voice of Scotland was systematically defied on all matters in which the feeling and mind of Scotland was interested, and that it was only in matters of small detail that a pretence was made of respecting the opinion of Scotland. It was important that a second Division should be taken in order that the fact he had indicated might a second time be signally illustrated, and no one knew that better than the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate himself, than whom no person was more happy when by the assistance of his Friends from England he was able to bear down the opinion of the country he nominally represented.

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT said, that, as one who had gone into the same Lobby with the hon. Member who had just spoken, and should vote with him again, he would take the opportunity of declaring that he entirely disagreed in every respect from the language the hon. Member had used. In that Lobby, he recognized a large number of Members who had no direct interest with Scotch affairs, and among them he was glad to see a majority of the Irish Members. He was aware that there were hon. Members who were so excited on certain questions that they found it impossible to discuss a particular question simply on its merits; but he would appeal to hon. Members on both sides to reject the present proposal on its merits. It was a retrograde proposal, receding from the position several times affirmed; it said that under no circumstances should the House consent to the abolition of a system under which a public fund was now devoted to a single religious denomination. On the merits of the Question he appealed to the House to reject the Motion,

The House divided:—Ayes 143; Noes 104: Majority 39.—(Div. List, No. 166.)

Resolved, That as the Ecclesiastical Assessments have been a burden upon land from time immemorial for the erection and repair of church buildings in the old parishes of Scotland, this House, in the absence of any grievance connected therewith, except in the case of feuars, for whose relief a Bill is now before Parliament, declines to entertain a proposal to alienate these assessments to secular ones.

And it being One of the clock a.m., Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

LIBEL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 294.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, he wished to move the addition of the clause which stood in his name, as follows:—

“In any action for libel, if the defendant can show by affidavit or other evidence to the satisfaction of a judge of the Division of the High Court of Justice in which such action is brought that the plaintiff is not domiciled within the United Kingdom, the judge shall have power to make an order that the plaintiff shall, within a reasonable time therein mentioned, give full security for the defendant's costs to the satisfaction of one of the masters of such court, and that until such security be given all proceedings in the action shall be stayed.”

The House would remember that when the Bill passed the second reading there was a clause of far wider scope of the same nature as this in the Bill. That clause enabled any defendant to go to a Judge and ask him, if he saw no cause against it and if the plaintiff had no available means, to call upon the defendant to give security for costs. That clause did not meet with the approval of the Committee, and was cut out. Now the clause he was proposing, and which he wished inserted in the Bill, was one of the same kind, but of a restricted character. His clause simply proposed that if a foreigner brought an action for libel the Judge might be allowed, on the application of the defendant, to call upon such foreigner to give security for costs, should he not be domiciled in this country. He had given an instance in Committee to show that the Judge ought to be allowed to have that authority. His right hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had contested his law, and had said that in all cases the Judge had a right to call upon a plaintiff to give security for costs if he was not a resident in the country. Well, he had referred to a work by his right hon. and learned Friend, and if he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) would allow him (Mr. Labouchere) to say so on his own authority, he would tell him that he was wrong. He saw in a book called Morgan's Chancery Acts these words—

“If, however, at the time of the application for security for costs, the plaintiff, whether an Englishman or a foreigner, is within the jurisdiction, though only temporarily security cannot be required.”

That was the law—it was admitted to be so, and he (Mr. Labouchere) thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would bear him out that that was just what the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not say. He had referred to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's work in order to arrive at his views. It amounted to this, that at the present moment a foreigner might come over to England, he might put up at an hotel in Dover; he might bring an action against a newspaper for libel, and if the newspaper proprietor or editor applied to the Judge to require the foreigners to find security for costs the Judge could not oblige the foreigner to find that security if at the time of the application the man happened to be residing at such hotel in Dover. Then, having brought his action, this foreigner might go away and disappear, and this unfortunate newspaper proprietor had to go into Court and send his counsel into Court, the foreigner never appearing on the scene. It might be if the plaintiff did appear on the scene, the action went against him, but that he had no means of paying the costs, and went back to his own country whither there was no means of following him. He (Mr. Labouchere) thought the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would admit that his contention was a reasonable one, and that in this case a man should be called upon to give some security for the payment of costs. But what would the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General say against the proposal? He (Mr. Labouchere) would tell the House. He would say, "It is quite right, no doubt, but you must wait for a large measure; why are you to do this in the case of libel and not in all other cases?" Well, everyone in this world must look after himself. Newspaper proprietors must look after themselves. If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would bring in that general law they would be perfectly ready to vote for it, but he (Mr. Labouchere) saw nothing on the horizon to lead him to suppose that any such general law was going to be brought in; and he should like to point out that in the matter of libel, the law was different in regard to procedure than that in any other case. In 1882 they had a measure called the "Newspaper Libel Act" before the House—

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): No; in 1881.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Well, in 1881, that Act was passed. There were special provisions in that measure as to procedure in cases of libel. There were special enactments in the Bill not only in regard to libel, but in regard to procedure generally; and he simply asked that, as they happened to have the present measure before them, they should take the opportunity to remedy what was a great wrong to newspaper proprietors. He knew perfectly well that there was very little sympathy with newspaper proprietors in this House. There was only one period when Members of Parliament affected a sympathy with newspapers, and that was just a little before a General Election, and, oh, then the newspaper proprietors were the best of the human race, and everything that newspaper proprietors proposed was listened to with the greatest attention in the House. But he (Mr. Labouchere) did not desire a Bill to be brought forward under such conditions as those. He did not ask for special favour; he wanted fair honest justice. That was all he asked for, in the name of every newspaper proprietor, for every newspaper proprietor in the country was in favour of the clause. The hon. Baronet the Member for Kensington (Sir Algernon Borthwick), on the Conservative side, had put in a clause which would cover the present proposal, and go much farther; but he had struck it out because the Government were opposed to it. He (Mr. Labouchere) was sure he should have the support of the hon. Baronet for that very humble clause which he now begged to move to be read a second time.

New clause (Defendant may obtain security for costs from plaintiffs not domiciled in the United Kingdom,)—Mr. Labouchere,)—brought up, and read the first time).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) said, he regretted that that proposed new clause must be opposed, and if on no other grounds upon those which the hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had himself stated. He (Mr. Kelly) held that the law could not, or should not, be altered in favour of a single class of individuals. If the proposal was to alter the general law so as to do away with the injustice which the hon. Gentleman had pointed out, so far as regarded the general public as well as the newspaper proprietors, it would be a totally different thing; but he did not know upon what principle newspaper proprietors were to be legislated for specially. As a matter of fact, the clause seemed more or less to regard the pecuniary interests of this one class. The point was that, at the present moment, if a foreigner brought an action against anybody in this country, there was a power to stay the action until security for payment of costs had been given; but that provision applied to all defendants whatsoever against whom actions were brought by foreigners who were not domiciled in this country, whether newspaper proprietors or not, and it was a very proper provision for the protection of our own people. But the hon. Member wished to prevent any foreigner from bringing an action without giving security for costs in one particular class of cases only if the foreigner was not domiciled in England. The protection which was afforded to the whole community at present seemed to him (Mr. Kelly) to be sufficient; but if it was not, then let proper protection be given generally to all classes. The hon. Member talked about the unfortunate newspaper proprietors. Well, he (Mr. Kelly) thought there were very few in that House who would not like to be in the position of some of those unfortunate newspaper proprietors. The hon. Member said these gentlemen were only looking after their own interests. Well, it was refreshing to hear such an admission. The House would accept the statement, and would bear in mind that the newspaper proprietors in the House were looking after their own interests, and not those of the public.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The two are identical.

MR. KELLY said, the hon. Gentleman had stated in the plainest terms that newspaper proprietors were only engaged in looking after their own interests, and nothing else.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he must explain. He had never said that newspaper proprietors were looking after their own interests, and nothing else. He had said that they were naturally engaged in looking after their own interests, and all the more so because their interests were those of the public.

MR. KELLY said, it was quite clear that the hon. Member said what newspaper proprietors were looking after—namely, their own interests, and it was also clear that in many instances they were looking after those interests without considering the interests of the public. He (Mr. Kelly) might mention this, that, as the hon. Member knew very well, a plaintiff really could never bring an action and then run away; because if he did run away, the action could be stayed at once, unless security for costs was given. But the point was, was the general law to be altered in favour of one particular class, and that particular class the libellers.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, it was always disagreeable to be convicted of being in the wrong, but it was especially disagreeable to be so convicted out of one's own mouth. He must admit that he had been in the wrong in what he had stated the other day, but it could hardly be expected of him that he should carry so many pages of printed matter in his head as were contained in the book from which the hon. Member (Mr. Labouchere) had quoted. The hon. Member had stated, that if a foreigner took up his residence at an hotel in Dover, and brought an action against a newspaper, remaining in England as a temporary resident up to the very day when the action was heard, and disappeared as soon as the case went against him, they could not make him give security for costs. Well, it seemed to him (Mr. Osborne Morgan) that that was monstrously unjust. He was as much opposed as any man could be to these small alterations of the law in favour of particular classes, and if there was any chance of their being able to bring about an alteration of the law generally in this respect, he should agree that it would be better to proceed by way of a general enactment; but they all knew that there was not the slightest chance of that this Session, and he thought that that was a case in which they might go out of their way to obtain what little they could, and, under the circumstances, he was disposed to support the proposed clause. There was an objection—a verbal one—to one word in the clause—namely, to the word "domicile." Every lawyer knew that that was a most dangerous word. He believed that the word "domicile" had caused more litigation than any other word in the Dictionary, and he would, therefore, propose that in place of the words, "the plaintiff is not domiciled within the United Kingdom," the hon. Member should use some such words as these—"the plaintiff has no permanent place of residence in the United Kingdom." That was a word which had received a recognized meaning in the Courts, and which there would be no difficulty whatever in construing. If the hon. Member would be willing to adopt that alteration, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) would feel bound to support the clause.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme) said, he must protest against this special exemption which the hon. Member (Mr. Labouchere) was attempting to introduce for the benefit of newspaper proprietors. They heard from the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) a week ago, the serious expenses he had been put to in consequence of a gentleman bringing an action against him having no private domicile in this country. What he should like to know from the hon. Member was, whether he thought actions for libel were at the end of the year to be placed to the profit or loss account of newspapers? When they remembered the large number of libel actions which had been brought against the periodical called Truth, they would probably have some notion that libel actions had been a very good advertisement for that paper. The arguments the hon. Member brought forward as to these actions cut both ways. The hon. Member said that a foreigner might be staying at an hotel in Dover, and might bring an action against a newspaper and disappear before costs could be claimed against him; but, on the other hand, a foreigner who was only making a short stay in the country might be grossly libelled, and it might be a matter of serious inconvenience to him to have to remain a long time here in order to bring an action in consequence of that libel. Therefore, the hardship was just as much on the foreigner as on the newspaper, and he (Mr. Coghill) would point out to the hon. Member who brought forward this clause, that the remedy for the evil of which he complained was very easy. Supposing that a person who would otherwise be the subject of a libel had no visible property and no permanent residence in this country, all that would be necessary to do in order to avoid an action would be to exercise more care in writing paragraphs. Before libelling a gentleman staying at an hotel in Dover, the newspaper proprietor would only have to make inquiries to find out the gentleman's residence, and on discovering that his stay was only temporary, he could tear up the racy paragraph he had intended to insert in his paper, and put it in the waste-paper basket. He (Mr. Coghill) objected to this attempt to give special security to gentlemen who published these paragraphs in newspapers simply and solely for their own benefit. He hoped the House would not afford special privileges by legislation to a class of gentlemen who were chiefly promoters of society journals.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, the chief objection to this clause seemed to rest on the principle that they ought not to legislate especially for the benefit of the Press. He would point out that the whole Statute they were proposing to enact was essentially and exceptionally one for the benefit of the Press, and why? Because the Press stood in an exceptional position. It was no exaggeration to say that the Press did not exist merely for the advancement of private interests, and when the hon. Member was taunted with the statement that newspaper proprietors were simply advocating their own interests in that House, he thought the statement was contrary to the facts of the case. The Press had a public duty to perform, and he could not help thinking that in the past it had performed that duty satisfactorily, and had watched the interests of the public with the greatest care. He could not help thinking, too, that it deserved well of the country for the manner in which it had disseminated truth amongst the people. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Coghill), in the remarks he had just made, seemed to have lost sight of a very important point. He said that if a person was not domiciled in this country, more care ought to be exercised in writing a paragraph containing any reference to him. But how was an editor, when certain information had reached him at a late hour of the night or an early hour in the morning, to make inquiries as to whether the person referred to, who might bring an action for libel, had a permanent residence in this country or not? If an editor had to allow a considerable period to elapse in order to make such inquiries, the information he might be desirous of giving to the public might cease to be news. As an opportunity seemed to exist for doing that which was just and fair towards the Press, which he contended merited some exceptional treatment on the grounds he had stated, he trusted that the clause would be accepted as, at all events, a tentative remedy for an existing evil.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) said, he did not think that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) quite understood the effect of the clause which he had moved. In the first place he had not made it apply to foreigners. There was nothing about foreigners in the clause, but as it was worded it would apply to all people—Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen, who did not happen to have a permanent residence in the United Kingdom. There were many persons living in England who were not domiciled, including Scotchmen, Irishmen, Frenchmen, and Germans. Was it proposed to treat them differently from Englishmen? He considered the clause most dangerous, containing as it did a novel principle. Probably the clause as it was drawn failed to carry out the intentions of the hon. Member. At the present moment the law would require a plaintiff to give security for costs, but the clause would have greater effect than that. There were thousands of persons living in this country at the present moment who had lived here for many years, but who, as was perfectly well known, were not domiciled. Under the clause a native of Scotland who had lived in London for years might not be domiciled in the United Kingdom. He should certainly oppose any Amendment of the Bill as suggested by the hon. Member for Northampton, because he did not think any Amendment could be proposed which would not interfere with the recognized practice in these matters. If a person came into Court now he was compelled to give security for costs.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) said, the clause proposed by the hon. Member for Northampton had been treated as if it related solely to newspapers, and was solely intended to affect newspaper proprietors, whereas in reality it proposed to alter the law of libel in regard to the whole community, and was not confined to newspaper proprietors at all. Objection was taken to the introduction of the word "domicile" into the clause. He understood that the hon. Member for Northampton, who moved the clause, would be willing to substitute for the word "domicile" some such words as "permanent residence." He maintained that the law as it stood was quite sufficient to meet the grievance of which the hon. Member for Northampton complained. He would read again the clause in an Act of Parliament which he had ventured to read on Wednesday last, because the section in question gave to a defendant exactly the security which the hon. Member for Northampton was desirous of giving. Section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867, provided that any person against whom an action for libel or slander was brought, should have power to make an affidavit that the plaintiff had no visible means of paying costs if the verdict was not found for the plaintiff. Thereupon, the Judge of the Court in which the action was brought was empowered to make an order that unless the plaintiff gave full security for the defendant's costs to the satisfaction of the Master of the Court, all proceedings in the action should be stayed. The hon. Member for Northampton, in the course of the discussion upon this Bill in Committee last week, referred to the case of some plaintiff who had sued a man and then subsequently left the country. The accusation was, that the moment the verdict was given against the plaintiff the plaintiff bolted, and the defendant found it impossible to get his costs. But that was very much the fault of the defendant himself, because the proper time to apply for security for costs was after the issue of the writ and before the trial. If the defendant in the case referred to had adopted that course he would not have lost his costs. There was another ground on which he ventured to oppose the Amendment. He opposed it on the ground that the law was sufficient, and that it did give that security for costs which the hon. Member desired; and he opposed it also on the ground that there was an order of the Supreme Court which exactly met the case. By Order 65, Rule 6, a plaintiff out of the jurisdiction of the Court might be ordered to give security for costs, although he might be temporarily resident within the jurisdiction. He thought that Order, coupled with the 10th section of the County Courts Act, met the case which the hon. Member desired to provide for by this Amendment. For this and other reasons, which had already been stated to the House, he thought it extremely undesirable to spoil a good Bill, and a Bill which he hoped would become law, by introducing into it a superfluous and mischievous clause.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) said, he wished to express his deep regret that so many hon. and learned Members of the long robe had thought it necessary to come down there in order to try and stop the progress of the Bill. [Cries of "No!"] Oh, yes; the House had seen what had taken place. They got up one after the other, and attributed to newspaper proprietors interested motives in support of the Bill; but it had been pointed out that the interests of newspaper proprietors were identical and conterminous with those of the public, and it was a particularly dangerous argument to use. It was quite obvious from whom the real opposition to the measure came; and he begged to tell hon. and learned Gentlemen that people who lived in glass houses should not throw stones. The lawyers in that House should be the last persons in the world to pretend that their own action was entirely dictated by disinterested motives. The hon. and learned Member for West Newington (Mr. Radcliffe Cooke) had referred to a section of the County Courts Act; but, speaking as a layman, he believed it was true that the section quoted by the hon. and learned Member only applied to cases where the judgment was under £50. [Cries of "No!"] He was told by an hon. and learned Friend that that was so.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, that whatever the amount at stake might be, the Judge had a perfect right to send the case to be tried by the County Court.

MR. LAWSON said, that in that case there would be no special jury, and both sides would be obliged to have the County Court as their tribunal. In many cases that was not the course which the defendant in an action for libel would be likely to take. He was told that the Order to which the hon. Gentleman had just alluded was practically not acted upon. Probably the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire would be able to speak from his own experience in this matter, which was very extensive. He wished now to deal for a moment with the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Coghill), who spoke earlier, and talked about the protection given to the newspaper Press, which was already making immense profits out of the public. It must be remembered that this Bill did not apply to the London newspapers only, but to the whole Press of the country; and he doubted whether the capital invested in that industry brought in as much as 5 per cent. The hon. Member had continually before his eyes one or two flourishing papers. Those newspapers could, no doubt, well afford to pay their expenses; but the clause was proposed in the interests of proprietors whose means were very much more limited. The hon. and learned Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson) had pointed out that by the clause, in its unamended state, it would be quite feasible for an Englishman, as well as an alien, to be brought under its provisions; but that was exactly the case at the present time.

MR. ANDERSON said, the hon. Member for Northampton had said that the clause applied to foreigners, and all he (Mr. Anderson) did was to deny that assertion. It applied to Scotchmen and Irishmen quite as much as to Frenchmen and Germans.

MR. LAWSON said, that, as a matter of fact the power given to the clause was only a discretionary one—namely, that the Judge should have power to make an order. It was not absolute or compulsory. If the House considered it better to have a further safeguard there was no objection to insert some such words as "being an alien"; that would probably meet the objection which had been raised. In truth, they were trying in the clause proposed by his hon. Friend to meet a case in which a plaintiff in a bogus action stayed in in this country just for a sufficient length of time to escape the obligation of being required to give security for costs. He then went away, and left his solicitor to carry on the action without any visible means of paying the expenses of the law suit if, in the end, it went against him. It was for the small newspaper proprietors that they were standing up, on account of the special dangers and liabilities to which they were exposed, and seeing that the clause was reasonably just and equitable, he thought his hon. Friend was quite justified in pressing it.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, the hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) had really no reason to complain because the legal Members of the House thought fit to express their opinions on this matter. If the newspaper proprietors would interfere in matters which were really questions of legal practice, they had no ground to complain if those who were connected with the law told the House what the practice of the law was. It was much to be regretted that the Bar had lost for so many years the personal attendance of his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). In regard to this particular question, however, the Order which had been read by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for West Newington (Mr. Radcliffe Cooke), provided, so as to prevent any escape from giving security for costs, that a plaintiff should show that he had a permanent residence in this country. It was perfectly correct to say that where a plaintiff had no ordinary place of residence in the British Isles he might be ordered to give security for costs, and that rule applied whether he was a foreigner or an Englishman residing elsewhere. The word "domicile" was a very difficult word to interpret, and might depend upon a variety of circumstances. The law, as he understood it, was this—the plaintiff issued a writ, and the defendant found out that he had no residence, but, as suggested, was staying at some hotel at Dover. He, therefore, took out a summons, calling on the plaintiff to show that his ordinary place of residence was in the United Kingdom, and if not, then he was required to give security for costs. If the proceedings were protracted, then the defendant could make a further application, stating that the security already given was insufficient, and the Master had full power to increase the amount of security. He had therefore submitted to the House that the present law was sufficient, and that it would only be re-enacted by the clause, even if amended as the hon. Member was willing to amend it. He had the strongest sympathy with the newspaper proprietors against these bogus actions. He had never said a single word either against the newspaper Press or the newspaper proprietors. On the contrary, he thought that if such legislation was necessary they ought to have it, but, at the same time, he did not think the clause would produce any practical effect, or that there was any greater difficulty in getting security for costs from non-resident plaintiffs than from other persons. It was one of those ills which everybody was heir to, and newspaper proprietors must bear it with the rest of mankind. He opposed the clause on the ground that it would not produce any satisfactory result, and if it were amended, as the hon. Member proposed to amend it, it would simply re-enact the existing law. He therefore asked the House to reject it.

Question put.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.), in moving the insertion of the following new clause:—

"It shall be competent for a judge or the Court upon an application by or on behalf of two or more defendants in actions in respect to the same, or substantially the same, libel brought by one and the same person to make an order for the consolidation of such actions; and, after such order has been made and before the trial of the said actions, the defendants in any new actions instituted in respect to the same, or substantially the same, libel shall also be entitled to be joined in a common action upon a joint application being made by such new defendants and the defendants in the actions already consolidated. The Court shall also have power to stay proceedings for such period and upon such terms as it may see fit in any actions, consolidated or otherwise, upon an application accompanied by an affidavit being made, with the concurrence of the defendants in the original actions, by any person threatened with proceedings by the same plaintiff for publishing the same, or substantially the same, libel," said, that, in his opinion, the clause was a most important one, seeing that it would produce greater simplicity in regard to actions for libel against newspaper proprietors. The consolidation of various actions into one would ensure a fair hearing of the whole matter, and would effect a great saving so far as costs were concerned, and of time as well. He was quite certain that the House would not attempt to get rid of the clause by simply saying that it was for the benefit of newspaper proprietors. As the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) had pointed out, newspaper proprietors, as a body, must not be looked upon as rich men. There were 1,200 newspapers in Great Britain which were honestly working for the public, and it would be found that in a great majority of cases the newspaper proprietors were not men who ought to be punished beyond what they could bear for a mistake or an error of judgment. At the same time, he desired to refrain from joining in the sneers and attacks which some hon. Members had thought fit to make on the Legal Profession on the ground that it was their interest to multiply actions. He was satisfied that that was a libel upon the Legal Profession than which there was not a more honourable one in the world. At the same time, hon. Members ought to show some tenderness for newspaper proprietors on this subject, seeing that they themselves were literally hedged and fenced about by barriers and barricades of privilege. Therefore they might, in some case, concede to others the advantages which they so plentifully enjoyed themselves. The object of the clause was simply to consolidate actions. It was unnecessary to point out that over and over again an action had been brought by the same plaintiff against several defendants for the same libel. He would mention an instance which had been brought under his own notice. That very morning he had received a letter from a provincial newspaper proprietor stating that, a certain newspaper having published what was undoubtedly a libel—a sort of sketch or skit after the fashion of Dickens' Dotheboys Hall—the proprietor of a school came forward and said—"That cap fits me, and I will prosecute the newspaper." He did so, and recovered £250 damages. No doubt that was right and just; but the proprietor of the school having thus been satisfied in Court in respect of the injury he had sustained, finding that the article had been copied by other newspapers as a literary production, with no idea in the world to provide a cap to fit anybody, had brought fresh actions against the proprietors of those newspapers, laying his damages in each case at £5,000. That, no doubt, was a great hardship, which, to some extent, this clause would remedy. The clause proposed that where sufficient actions were brought in respect of the same, or substantially the same libel, the Judge or the Court should have power of making an order for the consolidation of such actions.

Sir Algernon Borthwick

New Clause (Consolidation of actions,)—(Sir Algernon Borthwick,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read the second time."

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE said, he wished to point out that a good deal of this clause was already provided for under the existing law. He had no desire to speak against newspaper writers, for in a small way he had been one himself, and perhaps the first part of the clause might be accepted by the House on the ground that it did no harm. By Order 49 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, it was provided that actions might be consolidated by an Order of the Court, and it was a constant practice to consolidate actions brought by one plaintiff against several defendants. That course was pursued in the notorious Colledge case, where the plaintiff had received something like £3,000 already. That was to say that proceedings in 16 or 17 actions which were pending were stayed to abide the decision in one action. That practically amounted to what the hon. Baronet (Sir Algernon Borthwick) desired to see enacted in the present clause. He should not, therefore, oppose the clause altogether, on the ground that although it did not do much good it did not do much harm, and the early part of it would effect a small Amendment in the existing law. He did not think, however, that the House should accept the concluding paragraph of the clause—

"The Court shall also have power to stay proceedings for such period and upon such terms as it may see fit in any actions, consolidated or otherwise, upon an application accompanied by an affidavit being made, with the concurrence of the defendants in the original actions, by any person threatened with proceedings by the same plaintiff for publishing the same or substantially the same libel."

That meant nothing more nor less than that where a person, wholly independent of the original plaintiff, said he intended to bring an action for libel, or threatened to do so, although entirely disconnected from the original plaintiff, upon an affidavit being made by the defendant, the proceedings might be stayed. If that part of the clause were struck out, he, for his own part, had no great objection to the rest of the clause being embodied in the Bill.

MR. ANDERSON said, he thought the hon. and learned Member who had just addressed the House was mistaken as to what the law was in regard to the consolidation of actions. In no case of libel could consolidation take place. Consolidation took place where there was question of fact and where one trial would determine the question, so far as every other action was concerned, together with the amount of damages—such, for instance, as actions on marine policies. It had never been suggested that actions for libel which might be brought against several newspapers should be consolidated, because if such actions were consolidated the difficulty which would arise would be how the damages were to be apportioned. He understood that the suggestion now made was that in the event of a plaintiff bringing several actions against The Morning Post, The Daily Telegraph, and various newspapers, all of them were to be stayed, except that against The Morning Post.

MR. RICHARD WEBSTER: No; they are to be consolidated into one action.

MR. ANDERSON said, he failed to see how in that case the damages were to be assessed against the newspaper proprietors. It would introduce an entirely novel practice into the law, and it was intended by an understanding which had been arrived at with the Government, that later on newspaper proprietors should be allowed to give evidence in one action, though other actions were pending.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, he had explained on a previous occasion that no understanding of that kind had been arrived at.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had understood from what took place on the previous occasion that the hon. Baronet the Member for South Kensington (Sir Algernon Borthwick) had placed on the Paper an Amendment excluding a particular clause from the Bill, and was prepared to move it on the understanding that the hon. and learned Attorney General would insert an Amendment later on.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: No; nothing of the kind.

MR. ANDERSON said, he was to understand then that that was not so. The 6th clause of the Bill contained a very large concession, and he thought the newspaper proprietors ought to be satisfied with it. It met everything that they could possibly desire, and if the clause now under discussion were inserted also, it would lead to the greatest possible confusion. He thought the hon. Baronet ought to be satisfied with the 6th clause.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, it might perhaps save the time of the House if he were to make a short statement in regard to this clause. He did not quite agree with either of his hon. and learned Friends. There could be no doubt that the principle of consolidation on libel actions was established indirectly in the Colledge case. But this clause went a little further, and provided that where practically the same action was brought by several plaintiffs in respect of the same libel such actions might be consolidated. The present Rule with regard to the consolidation of actions was by no means clear, and he thought that if the House were of opinion that it was prudent to give libellers the right of consolidation, the clause would be an improvement in the law. Therefore, in so far as it proposed to give power to the judge to consolidate actions, the clause would, he thought, be useful. He did not see why any difficulty should arise with regard to damages, for, as his hon. and learned Friend would remember, there was no contribution among wrong-doers. Each award in the case of libel would be for the full amount of damages and costs. With regard to the last part of the clause, giving power to stay proceedings upon the application of any person threatened with proceedings by the same plaintiff for the same libel, it certainly did introduce an entirely new principle, and he could only assent to the 2nd clause on the definite understanding that that part was withdrawn.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK said, he would withdraw that part of the clause to which the hon. and learned Gentleman took exception.

MR. KELLY said, he concurred with the hon. and learned Member for Elgin and Nairn that newspaper proprietors were sufficiently protected by the law as it stood. If they were to consolidate all actions it was quite certain that there would never be any action for libel tried at all except at great expense to the plaintiff, and they would have the leading newspapers united as defendants with the humblest organs of the Press. He could not possibly understand how the damage done to a man by the circulation of a libel to him in all parts of the Kingdom could be ascertained in one action. If this clause were inserted there never would be any action tried at all, because the newspapers would continue libelling, and every fresh libel would necessitate fresh stays of the original action. He considered that newspapers were sufficiently protected now, and if this clause were passed it would lead to the greatest possible confusion in the Courts, and, above all, in the minds of the jurors who would have to assess the damages. It would only be necessary for a newspaper to go on printing libellous matter over and over again in order to prevent a plaintiff obtaining a verdict at all in a case where it might be most essential that he should have a decision as speedily as possible.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT said, he wished to point out that the alternative to the objections raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) was that if a multiplicity of actions was to be allowed they would have an unknown quantity to deal with instead of having one jury trying the whole matter, and bringing it to a conclusion with a comparatively small amount of cost. For instance, they might have 60 juries dealing with the same state of circumstances with 60 times the amount of costs involved. It was to protect the newspaper proprietors against the excessive costs which would be imposed upon them in such cases that the clause was introduced. Attention had already been called to the fact that in one case 60 actions were brought against a newspaper proprietor for a libel that was inserted through no negligence, and from no malicious motive. The newspaper proprietors settled these actions to a large extent privately, and if the plaintiff had lived he would no doubt have been able to have obtained large amounts in the shape of costs. In another case an action was brought against the Dublin Evening Telegraph, and damages were claimed by a noble lady for libel. The error was due to the Press Association, and not to the newspaper at all. All the actions were settled except one, which was proceeded with, and damages, together with a large amount of costs, recovered. No doubt, the leading daily papers were able to bear a considerable amount of expense, but the interest of the poorer and, at the same time, respectable papers demanded that this clause should be agreed to. It was on the ground that the clause would save a great deal of the tremendous expense to which newspaper proprietors were now put that he supported it.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he could not understand why, if this matter was of such importance as it was now said to be, it was not brought forward before the Report stage of the Bill. He could not think it was desirable at this stage of the proceedings upon the Bill to introduce this new and very important provision.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) moved the omission of the words after the word "consolidated" in line 9 of the clause.

Amendment proposed, in line 9 of the proposed new Clause, to leave out all the words after the word "consolidated" to the end of the Clause.—(Sir Algernon Borthwick.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Words struck out.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, be added to the Bill," put and agreed to.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire) said, he begged to move the new clause which stood in his name; but, with the permission of the House, he desired to make a slight alteration in the wording of it. The clause in the amended form would read—

"It shall not be necessary to set out in any indictment or other judicial proceeding instituted against the publisher of any blasphemous, indecent, or scandalous libel the passages complained of, but it shall be sufficient to deposit the indictment and particulars with sufficient indications to show precisely in what part of the book, newspaper, or other document the alleged blasphemous, indecent, or scandalous libel is contained, and the person prosecuted shall be entitled to a copy of such particulars, and such particulars shall be deemed to be part of the record."

The object of that new clause was to prevent scandalous, blasphemous, and indecent matter passing through the hands of a large number of clerks, young men, and it might be boys, as was necessary under the present state of the law. In fact, there was considerable danger in prosecuting for such libels; because they ran the risk of corrupting the minds of a large number of persons in pursuing the course now required by law. He had received a letter from one who had large experience in prosecutions of this kind, and it brought vividly before his mind the evil effects which followed from the present state of the law. The writer said that obscene passages were included in the draft case prepared in the solicitors' office; probably, they were copied again in the chambers of the counsel who drew the indictment; they were sent to the law stationer's, where two, if not more, copies had to be made; these had to be carefully examined and compared with the original; the indictment was lodged at the office of the Clerk of the Peace, brought by the usher before the Grand Jury, and it was read in Court, where the defendant was entitled to have the indictment literally read, word by word, so that the obscene matter came before thousands of people before it was finally submitted to the jury, and being read in Court it might be published in newspapers. Now, when the House remembered that the matter referred to was of the most detestable kind, of such a kind that it was almost impossible for any people to read it without having their minds polluted, they must see the great advantage of the change in the law he recommended. According to the clause, all that would be necessary would be that the passages should be marked, and described, and read by the jury. There was no necessity that they should be publicly read, and that they should so get into the newspapers and be diffused throughout the country, doing a very great mischief, in fact, doing the very mischief it should be the object of the law to prevent. He could not think anyone would object to this change of the law, and he had every hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would be able to give his support to this clause. He begged, with great pleasure, to move the clause in the amended form in which he had read it to the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the more regular course would be for the hon. Gentleman to move the clause in the terms in which it appeared upon the Paper, and then, if it was the pleasure of the House to read it a second time, for the hon. Gentleman to propose whatever Amendments he might wish to make in it.

New Clause (Obscene matter need not be set forth in an indictment or other judicial proceedings,) — (Mr. Samuel Smith,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, although, no doubt, made in the interests of decency, was, in the interests of justice, most inadvisable. It was perfectly obvious, from the language of the clause, as the hon. Member first of all proposed it, that he was wholly unacquainted with the form of indictment in actions for libel, and with the trial of such indictments. The clause, as they were asked at present to enact it, provided that where there was an indictment for an indecent or, it might be, blasphemous libel, it should be sufficient to indicate in the indictment, he presumed, though it was not stated, what were the passages that were complained of, and that then it should be necessary to refer to the document, book, or newspaper, in order to discover what ought to be part of the indictment. The clause went on to provide that such communication should be deemed to be sufficient evidence in support of the alleged libel. [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Richard Webster) (Isle of Wight): That has been struck out.] He was told that that passage was to be struck out. The hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) might have considered what sufficient evidence meant. How could they have sufficient evidence in support of libellous matter? In his (Mr. Darling's) opinion, it was nonsense to use language of that kind. What was proposed, in some form or another, was that in order that little boys in law stationers' offices should not be shocked, a book or a newspaper should be attached to the indictment for libel, with some indication or other as to the passages in the book or the newspaper which were necessary in order to prove the case for the prosecution. The hon. Member suggested that, that having been done, and the defendant put upon his trial, the jury should simply look over the indicated passages, and that the people in Court who were interested in justice being administered should never, from end to end of the trial, know what the passages were, and never from end to end of the trial know whether there was in them anything indecent or blasphemous. That would practically mean a trial in camera upon the mere allegation of the prosecutor that the matter complained of was blasphemous or indecent. What, after all, was the harm supposed to be done? The hon. Gentleman desired to prevent the perusal of indecent passages by boys, small boys, who he said were engaged in the different offices through which indictments passed. As a matter of fact, there was no proof that the copyists in these offices were boys. If the hon. Member knew anything about the clerks engaged in law stationers' offices and in lawyers' offices, he would know that they copied anything put before them, that they must copy many things which were not particularly decent, and that they copied them so mechanically, that it made little or no impression on their minds. He (Mr. Darling) was himself a lawyer, and he did not think that the necessary perusal of these indecent things had done him any harm. When a counsel had once read a brief, he afterwards took uncommonly little interest in it, and probably, at the expiration of a week, he would be unable to say what it was about. He had no doubt that stationers' boys were in pretty much the same position; but, even if they were in a worse position, was this not straining at a gnat? In Courts of Justice, it always must be that even the most indecent proceedings must be detailed; it was impossible to have indecent details huddled up in the manner the hon. Gentleman suggested. If the proposition of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) were pushed to its logical conclusion many criminal cases would be left untried for fear that they might produce a bad effect on the minds of police constables or ushers, or others engaged about the Courts. Of course, one knew perfectly well what put this idea in the hon. Gentleman's mind. There was a most interesting work, he believed, though he had never read it, which was called The Fruits of Philosophy. With respect to that work there was a prosecution, the passages complained of were not set out in the indictment, and the indictment failed upon that technical point. Since then, all indecent matter had been copied into indictments, and there was very good reason why it should be. If a person had been tried for libel or for anything else, and he was brought up again, he was entitled to plead that he had been either convicted or acquitted in respect to the same matter, and, in order that he should be able to plead that, it was necessary that he should be able to produce the indictment which contained the record of the decision of the jury. It was obvious that if a man had been convicted or acquitted already, he was entitled to be acquitted of that charge in future, and he was for that reason entitled to plead autrefois acquit or autrefois convict, as the case might be. It would be a distinct disadvantage to all prisoners or people tried for libel in the future, if they could not avail themselves as easily as they could now of the proper and most useful plea that they had been tried and acquitted or convicted before of the offence now laid at their door. He regretted to have to oppose as strongly as he felt bound to do a proposal, no doubt, made in the interests of decency; but he could not help thinking that this was an overstraining of any desire there might be to amend the law in this direction.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) trusted the House would allow him to make a very brief statement in regard to this clause. He was very sorry to say he entirely differed from his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling). If his hon. and learned Friend only had brought before him the amount of frightful literature, blasphemous, indecent, and obscene, which came before the Law Officers of the Crown, he would feel that every step should be taken to prevent the dissemination of such literature, even if it affected only 10 or 12 people. It was perfectly impossible to exaggerate the evil effect of the flood of disgusting, blasphemous, and indecent literature now being printed and spread broadcast over the country; and yet often it was inadvisable to take proceedings, because of the injury done by the details of the proceedings. He had said that in order that the House might understand his private opinion in regard to this clause. Of course, he was by no means insensible to the legal difficulties which had been suggested. If any single prisoner could be deprived of any right, if any harm could be done by the clause, notwithstanding the evils he had referred to, he should oppose the clause. But let him point out to his hon. and learned Friend and to the House that it did seem to him that, by the insertion of a very few words, every one of the objections that had been raised might be met. The point his hon. and learned Friend had raised was that, upon the indictment, it was necessary to endorse the libellous passages complained of to guard against the plea of error being set up. He (Sir Richard Webster) quite agreed that provision should be made that the proceedings should be exactly in the same position as if the words had been set out. It was quite evident, too, that the words "such indication shall be deemed sufficient evidence" could not possibly justify this Motion. When that objection was pointed out to the Mover of the clause he saw the clause went too far, and that the latter part was not necessary in order to meet the grievance he wished to remedy. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) had suggested that those in Court at the trial of a case would never see or hear the passages complained of. That was not intended; as he understood it, the object of this clause was simply to prevent the unnecessary copying and re-copying of many things which need not be re-copied for the purposes of the proceedings, and to insure that only so many copies should be produced as were absolutely necessary. By that means half-a-dozen, or possibly 20 people, who would have never seen these passages, unless it was for the necessity of copying them, would be spared the sight of them. Now, he had considered the clause with a desire to assist the hon. Gentleman the Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), because he sympathized with the object the hon. Gentleman had in view. He had, however, to suggest that the clause should be amended; that it should, in fact, read as follows:—

"It shall not be necessary to set out in any indictment or other judicial proceeding instituted against the publisher of any"—

perhaps it might be as well to insert "blasphemous"—

"blasphemous or obscene libel"—

he thought it was not necessary to introduce the word "scandalous"—

"the blasphemous or obscene passages, but it shall be sufficient to deposit the book, newspaper, or other document containing the alleged libel with the indictment or other judicial proceeding, together with particulars showing precisely, by reference to pages and lines, in what part of the book, newspaper, or other document the alleged libel is to be found, and that such particulars shall be deemed to form part of the record, and all proceedings may be taken thereon as if the passages complained of had been set out in the indictment or other judicial proceeding."

If the alteration he suggested were agreed to, the prisoner would have the same right he had at present—the Court would be in exactly the same position as it was at present. The indictment, which he hoped they would see abolished altogether before very long, and a simpler form adopted, would remain in the possession of the officer of the Court, and the jury would take the wording as they heard it read by the officer of the Court, or possibly as they heard it read by the learned Judge. As the clause stood, copies of the book containing the objectionable passages would be handed to the jury, who would thus possibly examine the particular passages more easily than if they were set out in the indictment. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Darling) desired to reserve to a prisoner all the rights he now possessed; all those rights would be reserved under the amended clause which he had suggested. He thought that by the amended clause they would get rid of what was a substantial evil; though it might affect only a small number of persons, they would certainly do no harm to anybody by the adoption of the clause.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) said, it was a little inconvenient to discuss a new clause with the matter in concern essentially differing from the matter which was proposed to be submitted, especially at this last stage of the Bill—namely, Consideration on Report, when, if they made a blunder, it was impossible to remedy it. He was obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) for adopting the suggestion he made to him just now, and adding to the clause that the matter should be made part of the record, because, if that had not been adopted, it would have been impossible to take, in error or otherwise, the opinion of the Court as to whether the matter constituted a libel or not. The hon. and learned Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) was quite mistaken in the case he most incorrectly quoted. Probably the hon. and learned Gentleman spoke from common report, instead of having read the case, which might account for the mistake he had made. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) had given attention to the words read out by the hon. and learned Attorney General, and he thought there was no objection to them; they would, in fact, make the law in England somewhat analogous to the law in America. But let him (Mr. Bradlaugh) point out to the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the clause (Mr. S. Smith) that he did not at all effect anything by his clause. He (Mr. Bradlaugh) had not the slightest objection that the passages complained of should be deposited in print, as if they were part of the indictment, and forming part of the record for all practical purposes. But if the hon. Gentleman imagined that any person could be tried for libel or for any other offence without specific evidence being given in Court, it was hard to understand what the hon. Gentleman's opinion of justice in any country was. If the hon. Gentleman imagined there could be any hugger-mugger way in which some persons might know what was complained of and others might not, he could only inform the hon. Gentleman that he was entirely mistaken. It was not possible, under the law as it stood, for anyone to reprint blasphemous or obscene matter, which might be contained in any counts of an indictment, and to excuse himself from criminal proceedings on the ground of it forming part of the matter for trial. That had been clearly laid down over and over again, and it was only a person utterly unacquainted with the law who could possibly suppose there was an opportunity of reprinting such matter with impunity. He felt some difficulty in having to weigh words which he had only just heard read, which were not the words on the Paper, but which essentially differed from the words in print. Although he thought the words suggested by the Attorney General were sufficient, he must enter his protest against a clause of this character being sprung upon the House on Consideration on Report.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) said, he desired to say a very few words in reference to this new clause. In the first place, he must join in the protest of the hon. Member (Mr. Bradlaugh) against having this matter brought before the House in this way. What was it they were now asked to do? They were asked to amend the Criminal Law. Was this the occasion on which they should be asked to do that? Surely they ought to be asked to do that when they were amending the Criminal Law generally. It was most unfortunate that this clause had been amended, and that the word "blasphemous" had been introduced. He was altogether averse to criminal proceedings being taken in cases of blasphemous libels, and trusted the word "blasphemous" would be rejected by the House.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I have pointed out that the time for proposing Amendments would be when the clause had been read a second time.

MR. KELLY said, he understood that the clause had been altered, and that, therefore, he was justified in commenting upon the amended form. He could only say that while he admired the motives of the hon. Member (Mr. S. Smith) who proposed this new clause, he felt it was brought forward on a very inopportune occasion. Under such circumstances, it was absolutely impossible for him to vote in favour of it.

MR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.) said, he entirely sympathized with the motive which suggested this clause; but, at the same time, he quite agreed with the objections that had been raised by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) and the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) as to the expediency of introducing a clause now, and as to the manner in which it was introduced. It was a wide question as to whether the proceedings suggested by the clause should be adopted at all. The adoption of the clause certainly would result in the revolution of our whole Criminal Law. Probably one of the oldest principles of our Criminal Law was that any accused person, when brought to the bar for trial, was entitled to have the indictment read for him in a clear and distinct voice. The law laid great stress on the fact that the indictment should be read over to the accused slowly and in a clear and distinct voice. If the indictment was not to contain the libel charged against the accused, he would be entitled to have the passages which were referred to picked out of the book, newspaper, or document, and read out clearly and distinctly, so that the very object the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Smith) had in view would not only be defeated, but quite the opposite effect would be brought about. As to the copying, it was well known that the copying of indictments was not done by boys or lads. Most experienced law writers, generally men of considerable standing as law writers, and of considerable age, were the men who copied the indictments on parchment; such duty never fell to the lot of lads or boys, even if any were to be found in the office. If his hon. Friend were acquainted with the practice of Assize or Quarter Sessions, he must be aware that it was not in the indictment, or in the copying of the indictment, that the objectionable matter was ever brought to the notice of law writers, or of clerks in the solicitor's office at all. The hon. Gentleman forgot that the main business that was done in regard to criminal cases was the making out of briefs for the different counsel. All briefs set forth the evidence which was to be given, and it very frequently happened that the depositions were placed in the hands of very young men to copy. It did not matter whether they were copied very accurately or not; it did not matter whether the spelling was correct or not. Young clerks copied out the depositions for the brief for the prosecution and for the brief for the defence, and often fair copies were made for the use of the solicitors; in fact, the depositions were copied possibly half-a-dozen times, and copied not by experienced and old law writers, but by whatever lads might be about the office, so that this clause, if carried in extenso, or even with the Amendments suggested by the Attorney General, would not in the smallest degree effect the purpose for which it was proposed. There was still another point, that it might tend to the maladministration of justice; for in the impartial administration of justice there must be full and complete and entire publicity. It was well known that all attempts to try cases, however shocking they might be to modest persons of all ages, in camera had failed. The Courts refused, even where they had power, to try cases in the hugger-mugger manner suggested. A certain amount of mischief must be incurred from the necessary publicity of objectionable and corrupt details; but to lay hands on that publicity, even in the smallest degree, would be to endanger what was the very palladium of justice. They knew that where evidence of an objectionable character was to be given in Court, the Court had power to remove women and children from the building. They could do this in cases of libel just as well as in other criminal cases. This clause, he believed, would introduce an unnecessary and dangerous innovation, and, therefore, he could not give it his support.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he thought that something must be said on the point of Order. It appeared to him that the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) was sailing very near the wind in proposing this course. In the first place, it was at least doubtful whether the clause came within the scope of the Bill. The Bill was intended originally to relate exclusively to the privileges of defendants, who were concerned in the publication of newspapers, in respect to libels. Clause 7, no doubt, enlarged the scope of the Bill; but it referred to what might be put in evidence. There was nothing in the Bill which affected what might be called the public order of criminal proceedings. Therefore, it was at least doubtful whether this clause came within the scope of the Bill at all. If it did not come within the scope of the Bill, then, under a recent Standing Order, it could not be moved on Report, because it was an enlargement of the scope of the Bill. He had another objection to submit on the question of Order. No clause could be suggested on Report which was not printed, and, as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) had pointed out, this was practically the last stage of the Bill, and therefore they ought to have fairly before them what was proposed. It was true there was a clause printed in the Papers, but it was very different to the clause which was about to be submitted for consideration. In that respect also his hon. Friend (Mr. S. Smith) was, if not absolutely under the censure of that Order, very near to it. Furthermore, as to the merits of the clause, he was extremely doubtful whether the advantage to be secured by preventing the passages complained of coming under the notice of an admittedly limited number of persons was at all commensurate with the danger involved on the other hand of not fairly placing before the Court everything which tended to elucidate the nature of the offence which was charged.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, that on the question of Order he desired to point out that there were two clauses in the Bill, one, Clause 7, which dealt directly with criminal proceedings, and Clause 8, which actually altered the Law of Evidence by making the person charged competent to give evidence. It therefore seemed to him, as far as he could judge, it could scarcely be said that this clause was not in Order. Then, with regard to the other objections which had been raised, he ought to remind the House that the Amendment was simply in substitution of the words, "sufficient indications to show where the matter stating such alleged libel is to be found." The words which he had suggested simply provided a protection which was very necessary.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the points which had been raised by the Chairman of Ways and Means had occurred to him, and the reason why he permitted the clause to be proposed was that it seemed to him to deal with the matter that was incidental to a fair and accurate report of the proceedings. The words "fair and accurate report" occurred in the 3rd and 4th sections of the Bill. As to the other objection, that new matter had been introduced, he had pointed out to the House that he could not permit the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Smith) to amend the clause before submitting it to the House. The new clause had been deliberately put on the Paper, and he had pointed out that if it was the pleasure of the House to agree to the second reading, it would then be time to consider whether any such new matter as the hon. Gentleman had proposed could be introduced by way of amendment of the clause.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) said, that unless his hon. Friend (Mr. S. Smith) was prepared to accept the Amendment of the Attorney General it would be quite impossible for anyone to support the clause; and, even as amended, he thought the amount of good which would be obtained by the clause would be extremely small. They all sympathized with the hon. Gentleman in the object he had in view, but it was perfectly true that these things were copied by men who had long experience, and, therefore, the amount of good done would be extremely small. The later part of the clause could not possibly be accepted if the words "it shall be deemed to be sufficient evidence" meant that the passages should not be read over publicly at the trial. It would be perfectly impossible to obtain the consent of any body of men accustomed to practise in English Courts to the adoption of any such plan. It was an unfortunate necessity that all proceedings in Courts of Justice should be made completely public. If his hon. Friend supposed it would be possible to alter the Law of Evidence in the way he suggested he was surely very mistaken.

MR. S. SMITH said, that, in order to save the time of the House, he might say at once he was prepared to accept the proposal of the Attorney General.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) said, he thought that the course of the discussion had shown that much more important principles were involved in this clause than there seemed to be at first sight. It appeared quite clear that the only persons who would be benefited were the persons who now copied out indictments. An indictment was engrossed on parchment, and boys did not engross on parchment. In some few cases there might be boys employed; but the course of the proceedings in Court would be wholly unaltered. The objectionable passages would have to be read out as now, and as much copying of objectionable evidence would have to take place in future as in the past in copying documents required for the due conduct of the case. It was extremely undesirable that at the close of the proceedings on a Bill relating to another subject, such a doubtful change as they now proposed should be effected. Since they had it on the authority of the hon. and learned Attorney General that in all probability indictments would be done away with entirely by an amendment of the Criminal Law, which this Government probably would project, it could only be for a short time that this Amendment, if included in the Bill, could effect any good to the limited class of persons who would be affected by it. It seemed clear that this amendment, if desired, should be an amendment of the Criminal Law generally. Would it not be better, therefore, for the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Smith) to wait for the amendment of the Criminal Law, which probably would be introduced early next Session?

MR. SWETENHAM (Carnarvon, &c.) said, he sympathized to the very utmost extent with the object the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) had in bringing forward this clause. He also sympathized with what the hon. and learned Attorney General said with regard to what came frequently before the Law Officers of the Crown. There was no one in the House who would take a greater part than he (Mr. Swetenham) in trying to put a stop to that which the hon. Member for Flintshire so strongly deprecated. But he could not help suggesting to the hon. Gentleman the propriety of withdrawing this clause, for the reasons mentioned just now by the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Newington (Mr. Radcliffe Cooke). He (Mr. Swetenham) had had considerable experience in the conduct of legal proceedings, and he thought the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Smith) had been misinformed with regard to the manner in which indictments generally were drawn. Indictments for libel were drawn up by the clerk of the indictment, who, as a rule, was not a person who employed in his office a large number of clerks. Having drawn up the indictment upon a sheet of paper, the clerk of the indictments handed it to some responsible clerk in his office, to put on parchment. As a rule, the work was not done by boys, and therefore the injury to the morals of boys was really imaginary. So much for what was done in the office of the clerk of the indictments. Let him point out what would be the effect of the Amendment now proposed. He ventured to say he should be able to convince the hon. Member himself that the remedy would be worse than the disease. Instead of the objectionable passages complained of being engrossed upon parchment, what was to be done? Those passages were only to be referred to in the indictment. Now, everyone knew quite well that when there was a little secrecy about anything there was generally curiosity as well. Suppose the book containing the passages were to get into the hands of the people the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Smith) desired to keep it from. They would naturally say, "This is a book containing very objectionable matter," and the first thing curiosity would lead them to do would be to study the book from beginning to end. In such a case, the very laudable object the hon. Gentleman had in view would be entirely defeated. It had been said, with perfect truth, that often boys were employed to copy the evidence into the briefs used by counsel. The evidence copied into briefs was, he granted, often of a very objectionable nature; but this Amendment did not relate to briefs at all. Under all the circumstances of the case, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press the clause to a Division. As he had said, he heartily sympathized with the desire of the hon. Gentleman to put a stop to the publication of the obscenity which they all deplored. After all, he could not consider that this was a proper time at which to introduce the clause.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, he hoped his hon. Friend would bow to the almost unanimous sense of the House, and would withdraw the clause. He had every disposition to appreciate the motive with which his hon. Friend had introduced the clause; but he would feel bound to vote against the clause. At best, the clause would only affect a very limited class of persons, while, on the other hand, it would really alter the whole course of Criminal Law. By the Criminal Law, as it now stood, a defendant or prisoner was entitled to expect that the indictment would tell him exactly what he was charged with. Under the clause as proposed to be amended, they would take away from the accused that protection, and he might be referred to a book which might contain, perhaps, 500, or 600, or 1,000 pages. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Attorney General certainly did improve matters a little; but he confessed that, as the amended clause did not appear in print, it was very difficult for them to understand its bearing. Upon that ground, and also upon the ground that the clause really interfered with the whole of the Criminal Law of the land, he hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had stated that the adoption of this clause would interfere with the Criminal Law of the whole land. The right hon. Gentleman was entirely mistaken. It was well the House should know how the matter stood in Scotland. In Scotland, if an indictment were to be brought against any person for obscene or blasphemous language used in writing, it was not necessary in the indictment to insert the blasphemous or obscene passages. To print the libel would be practically to increase the evil which it was the object of the indictment to prevent, and therefore it had been distinctly held that it was perfectly sufficient to refer in the indictment to the passages in the book or pamphlet which were said to be obscene by pages and lines, and to intimate in the indictment that the book would be found in the hands of the Clerk of Justiciary, in order that those who were entitled to see the passages might have an opportunity of referring to them. In the cases which had occurred all the scandal of these matters being published in the body of the indictment had been prevented. There had been no difficulty whatever in carrying out the law; the system worked smoothly and well.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.) said, he hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. S. Smith) would go to a Division, especially after what had fallen from the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate. It was quite clear that, in another part of the country, the practice which the hon. Member wished to introduce here worked satisfactorily, and without evil results. He had observed with some curiosity that all the hon. Gentlemen who spoke on and objected to the proposal now under discussion were members of the Learned Profession. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, most of them were. But a remarkable fact, in face of the opposition of hon. and learned Gentlemen, was that the head of the Legal Profession in the House of Commons supported the hon. Gentleman in the proposal he now made. As a matter of fact, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was convinced of the great advantage which would accrue from the adoption of the clause. Moreover, however that might be, they learned that in Scotland the alteration which was proposed here was already in force, and working satisfactorily. He thought that ought to be a sufficient reason in itself for the adoption of the clause.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) said, that the hon. Member (Mr. S. Smith) had been asked to withdraw the clause, because it was said that in some future Session a large Bill amending the Criminal Law generally would be introduced. He did not think it was very probable that such a Bill would be introduced next Session. They had been told that successive Governments had considered the question, and had drafted Bills relating to it. In his opinion, it was not at all a sufficient reason for asking his hon. Friend (Mr. S. Smith) to withdraw his clause, because the subject might be dealt with in a Bill which might be brought in next Session. Personally, he did not think it likely that such a Bill would be introduced next Session; certainly, it was not at all likely that such a Bill would be passed next Session. The object his hon. Friend had in view was a most laudable one, and he (Sir Robert Fowler) could not but think that although many of the legal Members of the House, notably the hon. and learned Member for South Roscommon (Mr. Commins), and the hon. and learned Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling), differed from him, the House was greatly indebted to the hon. Member for having introduced the subject. Certainly, if the hon. Gentleman went to a Division, he (Sir Robert Fowler) should vote with him.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, that the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Wolverhampton (Sir William Plowden) stated that only learned Members were opposed to this clause. That was not so; Members who did not belong to the Legal Profession were equally opposed to it. He was very much surprised to hear the hon. and learned Attorney General giving his assent to the clause under consideration, because he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman was a man of practical mind. [Sir RICHARD WEBSTER: I suggested alterations.] Yes; he (Mr. Labouchere) would deal with those alterations. The Attorney General proposed that they should insert the word "blasphemous." He assured the hon. and learned Gentleman that if the clause was read a second time, and if the Amendment the Attorney General had suggested was persevered with, there would be a very strong opposition on the part of many Members on the Opposition side of the House. This clause was proposed on the Report of the Bill. The word "blasphemous" did not appear in the clause as it was originally put upon the Paper, but they were told that they ought to pass the clause, in order that the word "blasphemous" might be inserted. They all knew perfectly well that the law took—

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, that he did not say anything of the kind. He spoke of the necessary alterations, in order that the evidence might not be altered, and that the particulars might be made part of the record. He only referred to the word "blasphemous" quite incidentally.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that if the clause were passed without the word "blasphemous" in it, the hon. and learned Gentleman who represented the Government upon this occasion would be in favour of the word "blasphemous" being inserted if it were moved. Therefore, hon. Members must look at the proposal as though the word "blasphemous" formed part of the clause. Now, everybody knew that in the present state of the law the Courts took a very wide view of what was blasphemous matter. It might be desirable to raise on some other occasion the whole question of the Blasphemy Laws; but until they had thoroughly gone into those laws, and until they had more clearly and specifically defined what was blasphemy, he objected to the word being dragged into a Newspaper Libel Bill. It was proposed that the Judge, and all the jurymen and counsel, should have copies of the book in which the obscene matter existed. Now, there might be cases in which they would not be able to get such a large number of copies of the book. But assuming that in the indictment, which was a thing which he confessed, whether it was right or not, did not trouble much the minds of those who were not lawyers—assuming that in the indictments the particular passages were referred to by pages and lines in the book, surely the counsel who had to speak upon the matter would be obliged to refer to the entire passages, and to state the entire passages. There would be a discussion whether the passages were obscene or not obscene, and the whole matter would have to come publicly before the audience. If anyone were to propose that in these trials there should be some rule to prevent the passages complained of being published without the consent of the Court, that would be a different question. But he contended that this clause did not in any way prevent publicity being given to the obscene matter. The sole reason that could be alleged in favour of the clause was that one or two or more persons, who were copying out a portion of the matter for the lawyers, would be prevented from reading it themselves. He did not think it was necessary to make a change in respect to such a very minor point. Anyhow, a respectable lawyer, when he had one of these cases to deal with, would surely insist that whatever copying had to be done should not be done by boys, but by grown-up men. That certainly would do everything which was desired.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) asked the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Smith) to conclude the discussion by withdrawing the clause. The hon. Gentleman had their sympathy, but it was questionable whether they could give him their votes. The words of the clause, "books and documents," showed very clearly that the clause affected the general law of the land, and not newspapers.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD said, that perhaps the Committee would allow him to state exactly how the matter was dealt with in Scotland.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has already spoken.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD: I asked to speak with the leave of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Smith) withdraw the clause?

MR. S. SMITH: No; I persevere with it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CLARKE) (Plymouth) said, that if the hon. Gentleman persisted in carrying the clause to a Division, he (Sir Edward Clarke) would feel bound to vote with him. He thought the clause, with the alterations suggested by the hon. and learned Attorney General, would be a valuable clause. He did not desire to exaggerate the value of it in the direction in which it was primarily intended—that was to say, he did not think very much would be saved with regard to the corruption of the minds of persons who copied the indictments. But, as one who hoped to have some time or other the opportunity of dealing with that which was one of the greatest defects in the Criminal Law—the monstrous length and complexity of indictments—he should be glad to see the clause adopted, and a remedy thus applied in one particular at least. If the clause were amended in the way the Attorney General had suggested, there could be no possible advantage to anybody in any particular passage of a libel being copied in the indictment. Supposing the indecent passages in a book were copied in the indictment, when they came to deal with the book everybody who had to deal with it must have a copy of the book itself, because other passages could be referred to to show the purpose and character of the particular passage relied upon by the prosecution. He did not exaggerate the value of this clause for the purpose of preventing the corruption of the minds of those who had to deal with these matters; but he certainly felt bound to support the clause as a step in the direction of a very desirable amendment of the law.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 145; Noes 99: Majority 46.—(Div. List, No. 168.)

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER suggested to the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) that he should confine the operation of the clause to obscene passages, omitting any reference to blasphemy. Any reference to blasphemy in the clause might occasion a long debate. The question, no doubt, was a difficult one to deal with, and, therefore, it might be well if the hon. Gentleman would content himself with confining the clause to obscene libels.

MR. S. SMITH said, he was quite ready to adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all the words after “proceeding,” in line 5, and insert the words “together with particulars showing precisely by reference to pages and lines in what part of the book, newspaper, or other document the alleged libel is to be found, and such particulars shall be deemed to form part of the record, and all proceedings may be taken thereon as though the passages complained of had been set out in the indictment or other judicial proceeding.”—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Clause.”

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he gathered that the pages and lines were to be stated. How would that be in the case of newspapers in which there were columns?

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, he thought that the words “precisely by reference to pages and lines” would throw on the prosecution the necessity of indicating the column as well as the page in the case of a newspaper.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to put in the word “column.” Did the hon. and learned Gentleman agree to that?

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: Yes.

MR. SPEAKER: The Amendment will, therefore, read—

“Together with particulars stating precisely by reference to pages, columns, and lines in what part of the book, newspaper, or other document the alleged libel is to be found;” and so on.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the hon. and learned Gentleman to be good enough to tell them what would happen if there was not a sufficiency of books. Would the book have to be republished? If so, a great many more persons would see the objectionable passages than otherwise would be the case. There was another point worthy of consideration. The various editions of the book might differ. Supposing the words differed in the different copies of the book, what would happen then? Would they take the copy of the book which was put in? An ill-minded man, if he was prosecuted, might secretly print off two or three different versions. The whole proposal was one of the most absurd and ridiculous ever made; and, whether this Amendment were pressed or not, he hoped that before they allowed themselves to write themselves down so foolish as to accept the clause they would take another Division.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, the objection raised by the hon. Gentleman only existed in his own imagination. The book would be deposited, and if they could not get extra copies of it, as many copies of the passages as were required would have to be made.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) said, he did not believe half the hon. Gentlemen who voted in favour of the clause had the least conception of what it really meant. They imagined they were giving a general vote in favour of social purity, and they thought that that would be a more or less popular thing to do. He assured the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) that they were all with him in the efforts he made in this direction; but this clause stood outside the Bill, and that was why the hon. Member for South Kensington (Sir Algernon Borthwick) and himself "told" against the hon. Gentleman in the last Division. When the Bill was in Committee, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge) proposed a new clause with reference to books and periodicals, and the hon. and learned Attorney General then got up and said that, whatever the merits of the clause might be, it had nothing to do with the Bill, which dealt with newspapers. But now the House was deliberately inserting a clause which was outside the general scope of the Bill. The present proceeding seemed to him thoroughly illogical and unreasonable.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE said, he did not know what hon. Members might have had in their minds when they voted for the clause; but he personally had a very definite intention in his mind when he voted for it. He hoped the House would stand by its decision, which simply made our law correspond with that which was in existence elsewhere, and which worked exceedingly well. This clause did not apply only to newspapers, it was true. It applied to something else as well. If it was useful in the case of newspapers, he did not see why it should not be applied to things which belonged to the same category. He hoped, as a lawyer, that this clause would be accepted by the House. He believed that it would be really useful. No serious objection had been raised to it by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). The hon. Gentleman had suggested that different editions might be printed, one containing the objectionable passages, and the other not. It must be proved on the indictment that the man had published a book which contained obscene passages, and a copy of the book being used for the purpose of that indictment, the person charged would have the fullest information as to what was the exact offence with which he was charged. He (Sir Edward Clarke) was anxious to amend the proceedings of the Criminal Law whenever he could and as far as he could, and if he found an opportunity, such as this, for amendment, in a matter which was one of the most manifest absurdities of our procedure, he was anxious not to lose the opportunity.

MR. COURTNEY said, he thought it would be more convenient that the Amendment should be disposed of before a general debate was originated.

MR. DARLING said, that if they were to make any Amendment of this kind, he wished it were left to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate; because then they would have the advantage of having our law made to resemble the very excellent law of Scotland. But at present it was provided that particulars were to be annexed to the indictments. Those particulars were afterwards to be part of the record. Now, it was to the record alone that the defendant must look if he wished to bring error; it was to the record alone the defendant must look if he brought error or alleged that he had formerly been acquitted or convicted. Now, there was no kind of provision being made for the book being made part of the record or for its being deposited or being kept anywhere. If, after a lapse of 20 years, a man who had been prosecuted was again prosecuted for the same libel, all he would be able to get would be a copy of a skeleton indictment and particulars. There would be nothing to show what the words were for the use of which he had been formerly convicted or acquitted, as the case might be. An hon. Gentleman opposite had said that hon. Gentlemen, in voting for the clause, no doubt thought they were voting in the interest of social purity. They thought nothing of the kind; they thought they were voting for the hon. and learned Attorney General. He (Mr. Darling) could not help thinking that if the House agreed to the clause, it would be the very worst day's work that had ever been done for people who might be charged with libel.

MR. COMMINS said, he agreed with the last speaker as to the injustice which would be done by the clause to persons accused of libel. Moreover, the result of the adoption of the clause would be that newspapers which were now practically precluded from publishing indecent details would state the precise pages and lines in the book where the indecency was to be found. The public, therefore, would be able to find the indecent passages complained of without the slightest trouble.

MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD said, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Commins) had given them an argument for printing openly in the indictment the obscene passages complained of. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to forget that people must get a copy of the book to refer to it when the pages in which the objectionable matter appeared were given in newspapers. If they had not got a copy of the publication, they were not likely to get one when an action for libel was proceeding.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words proposed be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, be added to the Bill."

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he rose for the purpose of pointing out that unless the point taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Deptford

Mr. Darling

(Mr. Darling) were recognized by the Government they would be in the ridiculous position that the defendant in error, or on appeal, or on a motion to quash, on the ground that there was no libel whatever—whatever the words might be—would have nothing whatever to submit to the Court. ["No, no!"] Clearly that was so in error. The Amendment, as now carried, did not say that the book or the words should be part of the record. It only said that the mere particulars annexed to the indictment should be part of the record, and just as they could not go outside the record now, so they would not be able to go outside the record under this Amendment. As the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General knew, the cases instancing this were overwhelming as showing that where there had been an attempt in error, or on appeal to raise any question, aye or no, as to whether the matter given in evidence against a defendant constituted a libel or not, the defendant had been unable to refer to anything with regard to it except the record. He could not refer to the evidence given at the trial, and could not produce printed evidence—the Court would recognize nothing but the words of the record, and unless the Court held that the words referred to in the particulars formed part of the record, they had reduced the Law of Libel in this country to a piece of nonsense.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE said, he thought the hon. Gentleman was under a misapprehension in this matter. The clause, as it now stood, provided that the book or newspaper or other document containing the alleged libel should be deposited with the indictment, and then the question was as to what part of the book or newspaper or document was alleged to be obscene. The indictment was part of the record. The book deposited with it was referred to in the indictment, and in the particulars. If afterwards the application had to be considered, and the record looked at, the book and particulars together would constitute the matter.

MR. BRADLAUGH: It has already been decided that the book referred to in the indictment cannot be read.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE: Oh, no!

MR. BRADLAUGH: Indeed, that is so.

MR. FIRTH (Dundee) said, he had looked at the Amendment with the view of seeing exactly how this was, and he thought that in this matter it would not carry out what was suggested. The Amendment said that in the particulars should be given the exact place in the book where the words of the libel were to be found, but as there was nothing in the Amendment that made the book itself part of the record it could not be used in evidence.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, they must credit the Courts in this matter with some common sense. If the Act of Parliament said that the book should not be necessary, but that the record should give a particular passage, he thought it might be assumed that the Court would see the page referred to. He could not help thinking that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) was more legal than the lawyers, and raised this point somewhat unnecessarily.

MR. COMMINS said, that it was upon the technicalities of the law that they were to depend for the protection of innocence, and it was also upon a very scrupulous adherence to the Law of Evidence that they had to depend if they wished to prevent injustice being done. He concurred with every word that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) had said. But, besides the objection of the hon. Gentleman, there seemed to him to be a greater flaw in the Amendment as it now stood. What did it say? Why, that they were to get rid of the production of the libel in the indictment, and the objection then arose that there would be nothing in the record. The record defined what was the offence of which the accused was guilty, and that record had to be made up by the Clerk of the Crown or the Clerk of the Peace, and remain in the archives of the Clerk of the Peace. Now the book itself, or series of books, were filed, and the objectionable passages transcribed in the record, or they were otherwise thoroughly indicated, no doubt, together with the preservation of the book itself. Under the clause as it stood, the record would be incomplete, and an accused person might be convicted 50 times over on the same indictment, and, even if convicted in one case, he could be tried over again and convicted for the same offence in another.

MR. DARLING said, he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke) whether it was not possible—because there would be the gravest doubt on this point even if the hon. Member were right in his opinion—at this stage of the Amendment to provide that the particular passages referred to in the indictment should be part of the record. If that were done there would be no difficulty in the matter; but he would venture to think that those hon. Members were right who urged that to make the particulars part of the record was not to make the charges referred to in the indictment part of the record. At any rate, if they made both part of the record it would be an advantage.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, that he joined with his hon. and learned Friends who had spoken on this subject in appealing to the Government not to press this clause at the present moment. There would be an opportunity in the other House to insert those Amendments and those clauses which were considered necessary, but which there was no time now to consider fully. There seemed to be a difference of opinion between some hon. and learned Gentlemen and the hon. and learned Solicitor General, and he (Mr. Hunter) would not undertake to say who was right. He would undertake to say, however, that the law on the subject was extremely difficult. The hon. Gentleman the junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) no doubt had derived great advantage from his superior technical knowledge on this question, because he had on one occasion saved himself from a very severe punishment by being able to pick a hole in an indictment where all the lawyers engaged thought the indictment perfectly sound. It was an extremely technical subject, and he (Mr. Hunter) saw no provision in this clause as now proposed to secure that the book, which was made part of the indictment, should be forthcoming with the indictment at any future time that it might be wanted. Moreover, it seemed to him that there could be nothing more derogatory to the dignity of Parliament, and more injurious to the legislation of the country, than, in a Bill which dealt only with the protection of newspapers in ordinary actions for libel, to introduce an amendment of the criminal procedure of the country in relation to libels which had nothing whatsoever to do with newspapers. He strongly objected to this "five minutes to 12" system of legislation.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 145; Noes 108: Majority 37.—(Div. List, No. 169.)

MR. LAWSON said, he now begged to move the Amendment standing in his name, namely—

In page 1, line 26, after "deliberative purposes," to insert "and the publication of any notice or report issued for the information of the public at the request of any Government office or department, officer of State, commissioner of police, or chief constable."

In moving the insertion of those words he should not trouble the House with any arguments, as he had been able to state his views on the matter on the last occasion when they had been in Committee. He had reason to believe that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had no objection to the insertion of the words.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 26, after the words "deliberative purposes," to insert the words, "and the publication of any notice or report issued for the information of the public at the request of any Government office or department, officer of State, commissioner of police, or chief constable."—(Mr. Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, he had no objection to the Amendment; but he would point out the desirability of altering its form. It would be better that it should read—

"And the publication at the request of any Government office or department, officer of State, commissioner of police, or chief constable, of any notice or report issued for the information of the public."

MR. LAWSON said, he would accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. LAWSON said, he begged to move the next Amendment on behalf of the hon. Member for South Islington (Sir Albert Rollit), in page 2, lines 14 and 15, to leave out the words, "interest and the publication of which is not for the public benefit," and insert the word "importance." He should like to say that the Committee which had been considering this Bill, and which was responsible for its draftsmanship, was anxious that this change should be made; but, as the matter had been fully argued in Committee, he would not trouble the House with any observations on it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, lines 14 and 15, to leave out the words "interest and the publication of which is not for the public benefit," and insert the word "importance."—(Mr. Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, at the time they were discussing this clause in Committee, speaking for himself only, he had pointed out to the promoters of the Bill that he was prepared to assent to certain parts of the section, and it was on that distinct understanding that the words it was now proposed to leave out were inserted. It would, therefore, be wrong on his part to assent to the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BERNARD COLERIDGE (Sheffield, Attercliffe) said, he desired now to move an Amendment which was not upon the Paper, and he moved it in this way, because the subject had only just been brought to his attention. The Amendment was to provide that when the question at issue was whether or not the libel published was a matter of public benefit, it should be a question for the jury to decide. It might be said that it was altogether a matter for the jury under Lord Campbell's Act; but when under that Act the defence set up was that the statement was true in fact, and that its publication was for the public benefit, the question arose whether it was for the Judge or the jury to decide whether it was for the public benefit. Only in May last a learned Judge—for whom, he was sure, the hon. and learned Attorney General would have every respect—namely, Mr. Baron Huddleston—in a case heard by him, had decided that, in his view, it was for him to say whether or not the publication was for the public benefit, and not for the jury. Whether or not that was a right interpretation of the law was not for him (Mr. Coleridge) to say; but, at any rate, a doubt seemed to have arisen as to whether it was a question for the Judge or the jury, and that doubt it was the object of the Amendment to set at rest. It was true that in the case decided by Baron Huddleston the decision was in favour of the defendant. The learned Judge had wished to direct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty, because the defendant in the case had proved the truth of the libel. Having proved the truth of the libel, the question arose as to whether the libel was published for the public benefit, and that was the point which the learned Judge held it was for him to decide and not for the jury, and thereupon he had directed a verdict for the defendant. But supposing that it had been the other way, and that the Judge had taken it into his head that a certain libel was not published for the public benefit, then—although the jury would have power to return a verdict of not guilty—they would feel themselves very much bound by the remarks of the Judge on the question of law, and they would hardly feel it within their discretion to find a verdict of guilty or not guilty, being under the direction of the Judge, who might tell them that it was for him to say whether or not the libel was for the public benefit. The worst that could be said of the Amendment was that it was purely declaratory. If it did in any way solve the difficulty, it did so in the direction favoured by the general opinion of the Legal Profession. He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would not think that he had brought this Amendment forward without cause. If the hon. and learned Gentleman declared that, in his view, there was no need for it, he (Mr. Coleridge) should be happy to withdraw it.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of Clause 4, to insert the words "Provided also, that in any proceeding for libel in which it shall be the question in issue whether the publication of the matter complained of was for the public benefit, such issue shall be a question of fact for the determination of the jury."—(Mr. Bernard Coleridge.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Attercliffe (Mr. Bernard Coleridge) was expecting a good deal when he asked one to express an opinion on an Amendment which he had never read. Personally, he (Sir Richard Webster) never should have thought that there was the slightest doubt as to a question of this kind being left for the jury, and he could not take upon himself the responsibility off-hand of dividing the House against the Amendment, if the hon. and learned Member told him that there was some doubt in the matter.

MR. LAWSON said, he would suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General should accept the Amendment provisionally, as it could hereafter be dealt with in the House of Lords. The words could be there struck out if found to be unnecessary.

SIR CHARLES LEWIS (Antrim, N.) said, he hoped they would not adopt this haphazard method of legislation, and thought that the House had to complain of the manner in which this Amendment was sprung upon them. If this sort of thing were to go on, it might be necessary to take some step to defend the liberty of the House against the possibility of grievous mistakes being made in legislation. It seemed to him that such Amendments as this ought not to be brought on at such a stage of the Bill, and they ought not to allow themselves to be inveigled into any of these declarations of the law sprung upon them in such a way that even the hon. and learned Attorney General seemed bewildered for the moment as to why he was to be drawn into the net. They were asked to stick in this Amendment like sticking a pin into a cushion, and they were told that whether or not it was necessary should not now be decided, but should be settled in the House of Lords. Hon. Members opposite seemed to forget their anxiety to do away with the House of Lords. If they were successful in their attempts to abolish that Chamber, who would do such work as was now proposed? Would it be the Clerk at the Table who would get rid of these difficulties for them? It was astonishing to see the remarkable cheerfulness in which hon. Members came forward to upset the general system of dealing with these matters. M. Olivier's cheerfulness in going to war was nothing to it.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Lewis) was mistaken. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Attercliffe (Mr. Coleridge) did not wish to change the law in the slightest degree. He merely said that he was of the same opinion as the hon. and learned Attorney General, but that Mr. Baron Huddleston had given a decision adverse to that opinion, and that there was some difference of opinion on this point amongst the Judges and the members of the Legal Profession. All the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to do, under the circumstances, was to make a declaratory statement in the Bill as to what the law was, that declaratory statement being not only what he himself believed the law to be, but also what the hon. and learned Attorney General believed it to be. The Amendment could do no harm, and might do some good; and, therefore, he (Mr. Labouchere) hoped the House would accept it.

MR. COURTNEY said, as he understood it, the hon. and learned Member for Attercliffe (Mr. Coleridge) wished to make a declaratory statement generally to the effect that it was for a jury to decide the issue in question. He doubted, however, whether the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to put the Amendment in at the proper place, as it was an addition to a special clause dealing with a subject which was hardly germane to the Amendment.

MR. ANDERSON said, he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would not press the Amendment, because it had come upon the House by surprise, as, no doubt, had the decision of Mr. Baron Huddleston, for which the hon. and learned Gentleman vouched. He must say he thought Mr. Baron Huddleston, if these facts were put before him, would be found to say that he had never meant anything of the kind. The statement had not, he believed, appeared in any authorized reports, but in one of those newspaper reports which were wholly unreliable. He would suggest that the Amendment should be withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn) said, he begged to move the omission of the 5th clause. That clause had been dealt with in a manner which he was sure had been very hasty and ill-considered. It made a most important alteration in the law, and he was sure that last Wednesday, when the Committee determined to pass this section, the change which would be made in the law by the section was not appreciated. It proposed no less than to repeal an important provision in Lord Campbell's Act, which was that where an apology was pleaded by a newspaper a payment of some money into Court should also be made. Now, he (Mr. Anderson) desired to call attention to this, which had already been referred to—namely, that Lord Campbell's Act was passed after great consideration. A Committee of the House of Lords was appointed to consider the Law of Libel; various persons were examined by it, and a very carefully prepared Report was made on the subject dealing with the whole question, and he (Mr. Anderson) confessed that the debates on the present measure showed that that course ought to have been adopted in regard to this Bill, because many provisions were pitchforked into it, first by one Member and then by another, without being properly considered—provisions which he thought ought first to have been submitted to the consideration of some Committee. This present point was referred to very fully by Lord Campbell as having been most carefully considered by the Committee of the House of Lords, and he said it was suggested that an apology only should be a defence. That was the statement in the Bill; but he went on to point out that the Committee, having carefully considered it, thought it very dangerous that an apology only should be sufficient. The noble Lord had placed great reliance upon not making a simple apology a defence to an action. Now, he (Mr. Anderson) did not think the House ought to upset a decision of that kind, taken with great deliberation, without having some really clear reason before them to show that that course should be adopted. For what was the result of the clause as it stood at present? It would amount to this—that a newspaper would be induced by the action of the Committee to defend an action by simply making an apology and not paying any money. That was the present state of affairs. The position taken up was this—that a newspaper might libel a man by some report or other, and might then make what a jury might find an ample apology, and the plaintiff would have to be satisfied with that. But who ever heard of such a doctrine being laid down? For, surely, if a man was libelled an apology would not always be a sufficient recompense. It seemed a very meagre kind of way to meet the case, when they had libelled a man, to say—"I am very sorry, and most humbly apologize." Surely that was not just; and he thought they ought to insist upon the payment required by Lord Campbell's Act, and to provide that, in cases where an apology was sufficient, payment into Court of £10, £50, or £100, as the case might be, should be required. If the jury thought the sum paid into Court was sufficient with the apology, that was an admirable defence, and if they did not think it sufficient they could make it more; but it would take away altogether the cause of action for damages. This clause as it stood was, to his mind, a monstrous violation of the law, and was simply inserted at the suggestion of newspaper proprietors themselves, without any Committee having considered the matter, and without witnesses having been called to give evidence and to say whether the present law had worked unfairly or not. These newspaper proprietors had caused this to be done, he did not like to say in their own interests, but, of course, that was the case. He did not think they ought to accept the clause; and believing it to have been passed hastily, and under circumstances to the effects of which the attention of the Committee was not fully called, he proposed to take the sense of the House upon its continuing to be part of the Bill, and he believed he should be supported in this by the hon. and learned Attorney General. ["No, no!"] At any rate, he thought he should—he hoped so, at any rate. He trusted the House would come to a conclusion that this was a clause which never ought to have been inserted in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 5.—(Mr. Anderson.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'In an action for a libel contained in any newspaper it shall be lawful for the defendant to raise by his defence a plea under the second section of the Act of the session of the sixth and seventh years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter ninety-six, intituled 'An Act to amend the law respecting defamatory words and libel,' without making any payment into court, and where such a plea has been raised (either with or without payment into court),' stand part of the Bill."

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) said, that under the clause, however injurious a libel might be, if only a newspaper published an apology and showed that it had not been actuated by malice, and had been guilty of no negligence, the unfortunate libelled person would have no remedy whatever. The very grossest libels were just those in which it was most difficult to prove special malice. The libel might be only the substitution of the name of a clergyman for a synonymous name, upon the trial on a grave criminal charge which might have the effect of ruining for ever the clergyman's character. What remedy would such a libelled person have under this clause? Absolutely none, because the newspaper proprietor would show that he had acted without malice or negligence, and that he had published an apology, and it would be held that that apology was sufficient. That assumed that the apology would be received by the same persons who had read the libel; but it must be within the knowledge of hon. Members of that House that there were a certain class of papers which people read very occasionally. For instance, a man who took up a copy of Truth on starting on a railway journey might not be likely to see that paper again for a considerable time, and, reading a gross libel in the copy he procured, he might never see any apology which might subsequently be published regarding that libel. He might never dream of buying the next issue. That would be a very common case. He (Mr. Kelly) asked whether it was to be possible, in such a case as this, for the newspaper proprietor to say that he had made the necessary amends by publishing the apology in the following week—to go into Court and say that he had made a little mistake, and that, though the libelled person came really into Court to vindicate his character, he should not recover one farthing of the costs to which he must inevitably be put, inasmuch as the apology had been made and it could not be shown that special damage had been suffered? A newspaper proprietor might, under those circumstances, libel anyone to his heart's content without being made in any way responsible for it. The clause, as it stood, was not satisfactory, and the point was whether the law would not be much better without such a provision. Holding, as he did, that no Amendment would make the clause work otherwise than most unjustly to the general public, he had pleasure in supporting the Motion for its rejection.

Mr. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said, that there were two branches of the clause to be considered, and they were both worthy of attention, though up to now only one had been spoken of. The first branch referred to the payment of money into Court, and he wished to point out that this question was being argued solely from the point of view of the respectable papers, of which, happily, we had a great number in this country. But there were also, unfortunately, a large number of papers which were far from respectable, and which, to a great extent, traded on libellous matter. At present, if a person brought an action against one of these papers, and the editor wanted to defend himself in any way such as was indicated, he had by this clause a system of protection. This, which was a provision against rascality, which no respectable paper could object to, and which was now being upset in the interests of good and bad papers alike. He did not believe for a moment that there was any newspaper represented in that House which would care twopence whether they had to pay money into Court in case an action went against them or not, because they would know that they would get it back again. It would not harm such newspapers. But in regard to the other class of papers, suppose they were dealing with papers of the kind he had indicated, under this clause the proprietor would pay nothing into Court, and they would have to go on with the case to the end, the man would get the benefit of such advertisement as he was seeking, and no costs could be obtained, as it might be discovered that the only person who was responsible was the printer with a set of type upon which there was a bill of sale already. It was said that they could not deal with the case by a simple apology. Now, he would give a case in point from his own experience, which sounded most extravagant he knew, but for the absolute accuracy of which he vouched as he stood there. He knew a gentleman who was libelled with regard to a matter of the most personal character. What happened? An apology was inserted a day or two afterwards under terror; but was that all? This paragraph libelling the man was copied into a San Francisco paper—and the man to whom he was referring had friends and relatives abroad in different parts of the world—the libel, which was copied by the San Francisco paper, was again put into a New Zealand paper, and he (Mr. Waddy) had a copy of this journal in his pocket, showing that the libel in question had actually gone all round the world. What remedy had this gentleman? They talked about special damages; but he could prove no special damages in this case—none at all. But even if damage had been done this gentleman, it would not be possible to recover for it—they would not be able to measure the damage. The man might suffer the deepest personal annoyance, and his friends also might suffer both in the Eastern and Western Hemispheres; and he (Mr. Waddy) maintained that it was not sufficient to say, as many newspapers did—"Oh, we libelled you; but our columns are open to you to answer what we said if you like." That position was taken up in the case to which he was referring. They thought that because a person libelled could not prove special damage there was adequate compensation in an apology. He would yield to no hon. Member in his desire to get rid of blackmailing, and to leave the Press practically free and unfettered so far as it should be left; but he thought that in this matter they were in danger of going a little too far now with the swing of the pendulum. They were not confining their attention to good papers, but were putting the good, bad, and indifferent altogether. Henceforward they would be putting it in the power of the bad papers, and of the rascally proprietors of papers, to say what they liked about people without being able to punish them in the way in which men of their mind were only able to appreciate punishment.

Mr. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) said, that, in his humble opinion, hon. and learned Gentlemen had very little consideration for the House, because they had been simply repeating the arguments they had heard in Committee when it was decided to accept this clause. He knew that hon. and learned Members could not come under the ruling of Mr. Speaker for tedious repetition; but every one of the arguments they had used had been used several times before. The Committee had been well aware of what it was doing when it decided that this clause should stand part of the Bill; and he earnestly hoped that the House would not go back and rescind the decision so arrived at. He believed a great deal of what had been said had no application to the clause, because the whole of it had turned on the insertion of an apology. Hon. Gentlemen seemed to have forgotten in the instances they had quoted that the libel was to have been published without malice and without negligence. As to the case put by the hon. and learned Member for the Brigg Division, did he allege that in that particular case the libel was published with malice and negligence?

MR. WADDY said, he alleged that it was utterly impossible to prove it; that was the point.

MR. LAWSON said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had entered into no particulars; he had only said that the libel was copied in different papers in different parts of the globe. He should like to hear what the libel was which the hon. and learned Gentleman said was so injurious in this case. How could a libel be injurious when it was published without malice and negligence.

MR. WADDY said, he did not say it was published without malice. What he had said was, that it was just one of those cases which generally occurred in which it was utterly impossible for the libelled man to prove malice or negligence.

MR. LAWSON said, the whole thing was very vague, and they could not understand what the hon. and learned Gentleman meant. It might be because he (Mr. Lawson) was not so skilled in the law as hon. and learned Gentlemen who had been obstructing the Bill that afternoon. It was assumed that a large majority of the newspapers they had to legislate for were disreputable and malicious; but, if this clause were struck out, they would be sacrificing the interests of all those genuine and honest newspapers throughout the country which he had alluded to so often before, which were not in the position of Metropolitan papers with great resources at their backs, but who, on the contrary, had very small means. These were the papers from whom, as hon. Members were aware, they had received letters from their own localities recommending the acceptance of this clause. By striking out the clause they would not punish disreputable newspapers, but would protect disreputable litigants and solicitors. He trusted that, as they had had an ample discussion of this matter in Committee, they would not reduce the Bill to a shadow of its former self by striking out the clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight) said, he thought the hon. Member for West St. Pancras had pitched his speech somewhat too high. He thought the hon. Member seemed to have forgotten that certain Members stated distinctly, when they voted for the second reading of this clause, that they voted for it on the understanding that such modification would be made in it as would prevent the words "special damage" remaining in.

MR. LAWSON said, he was well aware of that, and he only meant that the clause should remain in in a modified form.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER said, he had considered whether any Amendment of the clause in the way of cutting out the words would be sufficient to meet the objections entertained to it. If there was any grievance which could be met without any harm being done to suitors, they ought to meet him; but it seemed to him that to strike out the words "special damage" would simply be to re-enact the law as it at present stood. The object of the clause was to free a newspaper proprietor from liability when a libel had been published in his paper without malice and without negligence, where the person libelled could not prove special damage. In such a case, therefore, the clause would make the insertion of an apology an answer to the action; but as he did not believe that such a change in the law would be a salutary one, he thought that, inasmuch as newspaper proprietors had already obtained many valuable improvements made in their favour by the earlier provisions of the Bill, it would be advisable for them to consent to having this clause struck out.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) said, with regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) as to cases not being proved in this House, the fact was that cases had been proved over and over again where absolute injury had been done to individuals by respectable newspapers, whose only plea was that they inserted these libels without malice. Why, it was just that kind of newspaper that could put in that plea. No one would contend for one moment that the editor of The Times, Daily Telegraph, Daily News, Morning Post, Standard, and papers of that kind would allow libels to appear in their papers maliciously; but they wanted to protect a man against being libelled in these newspapers by some vagabond outside, who would send in reports which would find their way into the papers on the ground that they came from perfectly untainted sources. What he felt was that, above everything, it was the duty of this House to protect the characters of individuals. The newspapers of this country were of great power. They were often told that the newspapers were the fourth estate of the Realm. That might be so; but every other estate of the Realm was bound more or less by responsibilities, and was it to be said that the fourth estate was to be relieved of all responsibility and of all liability? It was to the interest of the community that they should take measures to protect individual character, and make it as difficult as possible for the libeller to get away from his responsibility. They had endeavoured to amend the clause when the Bill was in Committee, and certain Amendments had been agreed to; but it was distinctly understood at that time that certain other Amendments were to be made, or attempted to be made, when the clause came up again on Report.

SIR CHARLES LEWIS (Antrim, N.) said, he desired to know what was the meaning of the words "special damage?" Everyone knew how difficult it was to dissect ordinary damage, and it seemed to him that that consideration rendered it all the more necessary that hon. Members should be extra careful in dealing with the main bulk of the clause, and that they should make up their minds whether they intended to enunciate the doctrine that an apology should be sufficient.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, the main objection of hon. and learned Gentlemen, he gathered, was to the word "special;" but that word was not in the Bill as originally framed. It was put in by an Amendment in Committee. ["No, no!"] There was a Division on the Question, and the word was challenged, and the Committee divided in favour of it—that was to say, the House decided in favour of the clause with this word in it. He could perfectly well understand that there were objections to the word "special," and he would venture to suggest that the House should pass the clause, and that then those who were personally in favour of the word "special" should give up their point, and agree to the clause without that word. Many hon. Members would vote on this question blindly, and would not look into the matter; and he would, therefore, ask the House to consider the words he would suggest to them, and to see how the clause would be without the word "special," and the House could then come to a conclusion as to whether newspapers would be put to any disadvantage, or whether any injustice would be done to litigants. The words he suggested were—

"If it shall appear on the trial that any libel was made without malice and without negligence, and that the defendant had inserted an apology as by the Act provided, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to recover any damages except such damages as he can prove that he has sustained by the publication of such libel."

He would put it to hon. Members whether, if the clause were put in that way, it would be any sort of injustice to those who brought complaints against newspapers. He would point out that it was possible, if the word "special" were left in, that the hon. and learned Attorney General and the Government would be inclined to vote against the Bill on the third reading. There was a good deal in leaving out the word "special." There was a good deal in the Bill which would be useful to newspaper proprietors and a fortiori to the public as well; and under the circumstances he would not like to risk losing the whole cake by insisting upon one particular plum in it. He trusted, therefore, that they would adopt the clause on the understanding that the word "special" would not be pressed.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.) said, he certainly should press this clause to a Division, as he considered it the most valuable clause in the Bill. It was particularly levelled at protecting newspapers from the unfair attacks of speculative attorneys and plaintiffs. Papers, as a rule, had a great deal of regard for the feelings of persons libelled, and though the House had heard a great deal of libel cases they had had only special cases cited, and he did not think they had at all fairly considered the question from a broad point of view. Throughout his experience on the Press he had always found that the great mass of papers were only too ready to rectify a libel, not only to explain, but also to pay. They were quite ready to pay whenever they thought injustice had been committed. They were always ready to give compensation where any special or even general damage could be shown; they did this willingly and without a murmur. The newspapers did not complain of the law, they did not complain of special damages, or a proper action being brought against them, but the complaint was, that where they might have published libels without malice or negligence, some libels which would never have been taken hold of by a respectable person, they were taken up by an impecunious nobody who was prompted by some little lawyer to bring an action. There were libels and libels. Sometimes the matters complained of were libels, though generally they were not, and in most cases the newspapers were told by their legal advisers that it was better to compromise, as otherwise they would not get their costs. He thought that it was necessary that this clause should be retained in order to prevent frivolous actions. He trusted the House would vote the clause as it was voted by the Committee. There were certain Amendments on the Paper which could not be taken until the clause was voted, and whatever might be the opinion of the House on the details, he hoped, at any rate, that the principle of the clause would be unanimously adopted.

MR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.) said, he could not understand the arguments of the hon. Bart. the Member for South Kensington (Sir Algernon Borthwick). Under Lord Campbell's Act a newspaper had power to pay a sum of money and to plead an apology. The hon. Baronet said he had always found newspapers eager to pay money into Court where damage had been done. What, therefore, could be the objection to the provision under Lord Campbell's Act? In the case of a man who was libelled, either he was injured or he was not, and if he was injured he (Mr. Commins) failed to see why the newspaper should be relieved of all liability. He regarded it as a misfortune that hon. Gentlemen who were not lawyers should have to deal with these legal questions, as it got them into such messes as the Houses were now in with regard to "special damages." It must be remembered that special damages were not always capable of proof, and that a man might have suffered serious injury by libel although it might not be possible for him to prove that he was refused the sale of a pound of sugar or a pound of meat by tradesmen in consequence of such libel. A man whose character was injured was clearly entitled to compensation, and the only chance he had of having his character reinstated was by bringing an action and going into the witness-box. Looking at the Bill as having passed into law and become a Working Act, the result of the clause would be that the newspaper proprietor who had libelled a man, wronged his character, taken away his means of living, and inflicted upon him pain that would not cease as long as he lived, could further inflict upon him a bill of costs, and thus deprive him of his last crust; because the man would be under the imperative necessity of clearing himself in the witness-box. The effect of the clause would thus be that a man could only clear his character by final ruin. Now, if any provision had been introduced into the Bill that would deprive the proprietor under all circumstances of the right of claiming costs, the case would be bad enough; but if such a provision as he had tried to persuade the Committee to accept had been admitted—namely, that the proprietor should assist the individual libelled in getting satisfaction from his slanderer by handing over the notes, or by producing a witness to prove the slander, he should have been inclined to support the clause. But nothing of the kind had been done, and it was here intended to add another great source of evil to the Bill, and place the person libelled in a more unfortunate position than before.

He thought there should be no more immunity for a newspaper proprietor who destroyed the character of an individual than there was for any one else engaged in ordinary trade operations.

MR. ANDERSON rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS ACT (1866)

AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 161.]

(Mr. Dugdale, Mr. Whitmore, Mr. Wharton, Mr. Curzon, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Mark Stewart.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) said, when the Bill was in Committee he had, on short Notice, drafted a clause with reference to the form of Order for detention of offenders, which, having been hurriedly considered, was rejected by the Committee. But thinking that there were good reasons for the admission of the clause, he had redrawn it, and now begged to submit it to the House. He found since last week that he had ample ground to go upon. The Bill proceeded on the lines of the Act of 1866, and as his desire was to follow that Act more strictly than was done in the Bill, he had adapted the clause which required the gaoler to detain the offender for 14 days to the case provided for in the Bill. His object was to impress on the person detaining the offender and the offender himself the nature and importance of the position in which they would stand to each other. He thought it should be made clear to the House that a new position was about to be created. He pointed out that while the keeper was not, as the Bill stood, to have brought home to him the consequences of any casual neglect, the person in his charge was liable to three months' imprisonment, with or without hard labour, if he took French leave and ran away from him—that was to say, to avoid the objectionable practice of sending a boy to prison in the first instance, he might run away and then get a sentence of three months' imprisonment. For those reasons, he thought, they ought in the most formal way to set out the position as between the keeper and the offender in the manner proposed in the Schedule to which the clause he was about to move referred. He was prepared not merely to support the clause on principle, but also the Schedule which he should propose, and which was wholly unobjectionable as well as quite desirable. It was unobjectionable because it followed exactly the order for detention contained in the Act of 1866, which, like his new clause, was permissive. It seemed to him unwise to give a boy who had been sentenced to four years in a reformatory school the chance of escaping too easily from his keeper during his 14 days' detention.

New Clause—

(Form of Order of detention.)

"The order for the detention of an offender made in pursuance of this Act may as to its formal parts be in the form set forth in the Schedule to this Act, and shall contain on the face of it the penalties incurred by persons under section seven of this Act,"—(Mr. W. F. Lawrence.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question. "That the Clause be read the second time," put, and agreed to.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) said, he agreed with his hon. Friend that it was, in regard to this new departure, necessary to take all possible precautions with a view to preventing the powers of the Bill to be exercised with laxity. But he might observe that it was very doubtful whether the first part of the proposed clause was necessary. His hon. Friend would find that by the 36th section of the Act of 1866, certain forms might be used to meet circumstances which might arise, and that one of these was the form of order for detention, which he submitted with a slight alteration could be made appropriate to the Bill. He failed to perceive what it was his hon. Friend had added to the clause of the Act of 1866 by his clause and Schedule which they could usefully adopt. He observed that his hon. Friend made it compulsory that there should be a statement on the face of the detention order of the penalty to which persons might be liable for what he might call escaping from the Bill. But he thought it would be much more desirable to take powers for a Public Department which had ample time for the purpose to settle the necessary forms.

Mr. Commins

MR. DUGDALE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton) said, he agreed that the form of order for detention should bear on its face the penalties incurred by persons for evading the Act; but he did not see any necessity for any form being set out in a Schedule to the Bill, because it was provided that the Act of 1866 should be constantly at one with this Act, and by Section 36 of the former Act it was provided that no summons or order for carrying out the provisions of the Act should be invalid for want of form, and that the Schedules might be used with such variations as might be required. Therefore he thought the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman unnecessary, and would prefer to leave it to the Home Office to frame rules, or else to follow the Act of 1866 with such alterations of form as might be necessary.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he did not think they ought to pass an Act with any doubtful matter in it. It would be premature to express any opinion on the Schedule of the hon. Gentleman now; but he hoped the clause would be read a second time.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY suggested, that after "be," in line 2, they should add the words—

"Such as from time to time shall be framed by one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State, and shall contain on the face of it the penalties provided for by this Act."

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University) said, this proposal went against the principle that the Act ought to be complete in itself. It was pretty generally admitted that one of the great faults of modern legislation was that it was so common for one Act to refer to others, and it was a pity to repeat this error. If the forms of the Act of 1866 were good, he did not see why they were not good enough for the present Bill.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) said, the change made by the Bill was clearly not contemplated by the Act of 1866, and the circumstances under which the forms could be varied could not by any stretching be considered to have relation to the cases contemplated by the Bill. The Act of 1866 provided for the temporary imprisonment of the juvenile offender, whereas the object of the Bill was exactly the opposite. It provided that the offender should not be imprisoned, but that in order that he should not be contaminated during the time he was waiting to be sent to a reformatory he should be kept in the private custody of some person. He did not think the Schedule of the hon. Gentleman desirable.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, they ought to provide machinery to allow the Act to be properly worked the moment it came into force.

Verbal Amendments made.

Amendment proposed—

In line 2 of the new Clause to leave out the words "in the form set forth in the Schedule of this Act," and insert "with such variations as circumstances require, as shall be from time to time prescribed by one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State."—(Mr. Stuart-Wortley.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

On the Motion of MR. DUGDALE the following Amendment made:—In Clause 4, page 2, line 11, leave out "police" and insert "a police officer appointed for the purpose by the said Court Justices or magistrate;" in Clause 5, page 2, line 19, after "magistrate" insert "and thence to the reformatory school."

Bill to be read the third time upon Friday.

DISTRESS FOR RENT (DUBLIN) BILL.

(Mr. Murphy, Mr. Johnston, Mr. Dwyer Gray, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Captain McCalmont, Mr. T. Harrington.)

[BILL 159.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Certain goods exempted from distress and execution).

THE CHAIRMAN: I have to point out that the Amendment to this clause, in the name of the hon. Member for North Sligo (Mr. P. McDonald) is not within the scope of the Bill. It proposes to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Conscience, which could only be done by instruction before the Bill went into Committee.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 8, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Public store to be maintained by the municipal authority).

On the Motion of Mr. MURPHY the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 36, after "times" insert "and in such manner."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Bill reported, with an amended Title; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

OATHS BILL.—[Bill 7.]

(Mr. Bradlaugh, Sir John Simon, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Courtney Kenny, Mr. Burt, Mr. Coleridge, Mr. Illingworth, Mr. Richard, Colonel Eyre, Mr. Jesse Collings.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 13th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1 (affirmation may be made instead of oath).

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, after the word "person," to insert the words "excepting those who state they have no religious belief."—(Mr. Norris.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) said, the question before the Committee was that of the Amendment which he had moved a week ago and which he hoped would to-day be accepted. He would not disguise from the Committee that his Amendment should be construed as the outcome of his desire to cripple the Bill, and he would add that he should be very glad if that result was to be attained. But apart from that, there were many difficulties which would be created by the Bill. It had been pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling), on a previous occasion, that it would have the effect of causing much difficulty in the Law Courts, if people of all persuasions, such as Hindoos and Mahomedans, were to insist on other forms of affirmation. On the second reading of the Bill, an hon. Member had stated that he was prepared to stand up before God and his fellow-men and declare that he would do that which was right. That was what he (Mr. Norris) thought they had an opportunity of doing now; every Member who had been elected for any constituency in the Kingdom under those circumstances had taken his seat in that House without difficulty. He was not opposed to the freedom of the Press, or the freedom of the subject in any other walk or position in life; but in a case of this kind there was a line to be drawn, and he did think it was for the House to put some limit upon the application of the principle of the Bill. As he had stated, it was his intention, and that of his hon. Friends, to contest the Bill step by step. On the other hand he did not wish to impart into his remarks any references of a personal character. There were considerations of a higher nature involved here, and he could not but think that this Bill would have the effect of undermining that faith which was inherited by and believed in by the English people. He thought it would be a good thing if the Committee would follow the many words spoken by the present Emperor of Germany in his address to his people—that they should set an example to nations, "foster piety and the fear of God," and be the true guardians of the rights of the people.

Question put.

It being half after Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

QUESTIONS.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—CONSPIRACY—RELEASE OF KILLEAGH PRISONERS.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) a Question of which I have given him private Notice—that is, Whether it is true that the Court of Exchequer in Dublin to-day discharged the prisoners from Killeagh, and whether they have discharged them on the ground that there was absolutely no evidence of conspiracy?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It is quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman has stated, that the Court of Exchequer has discharged the prisoners; but it is not, however, accurate to say that they have been discharged on the ground that there was absolutely no evidence of conspiracy. On the contrary, there was the clearest evidence that there was conspiracy punishable at Common Law, but it was held that there was not sufficient evidence of that particular kind of conspiracy that was necessary under the Act.

MR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, if at the Crimes Court now sitting at Castlereagh the Crown agents had persistently refused to produce the depositions taken against the persons returned for trial and charged with conspiracy, notwithstanding the provisions of the first section of the Crimes Act; and, whether they had done so by the direction of the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman puts a Question on the Paper I will inquire into the matter.

THE EXECUTIVE (IRELAND) — RU-MOURED RESIGNATION OF THE CHIEF SECRETARY TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, is it true, as stated in the newspapers, that he has already resigned or is about to resign his Office?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I have no objection to answer. It is one of those ridiculous fictions so current in the Irish Press.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): May I ask, whether the Irish Press to which the right hon. Gentleman refers is not a supporter of the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not reply.

MR. CLANCY: May I ask, with reference to the Question put by my hon. Friend the Member for South Roscommon (Mr. Commins), and as it is a matter of urgency—because I understand the Crown have refused at three or four different times to comply with the Provisions of the Act of Parliament, and as the trial is proceeding, and will also be on to-morrow—may I ask, are we to be told in this House that the Crown have no information on questions of this sort—namely, whether they are content to sanction a distinct violation of an Act of Parliament?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. If I am asked distinctly that Question, I shall have no difficulty in stating that the Crown are not prepared to sanction a distinct violation of an Act of Parliament.

MR. CLANCY: Then will the right hon. Gentleman telegraph to his managers at Castlereagh, and press them to produce these depositions that have been so repeatedly refused by the Crown?

[No reply.]

COMMONS REGULATION PROVISIONAL ORDER

[THERFIELD HEATH] BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order for the Regulation of Therfield Heath and Greens, situated in the parish of Therfield, in the county of Hertford, in pursuance of a report from the Land Commissioners for England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Stuart-Wortley and Mr. Secretary Matthews.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 301.]

METROPOLIS (OPEN SPACES)—PROVISION FOR SEATS IN PARLIAMENT SQUARE.—QUESTION.

In reply to the Earl of MEATH,

LORD HENNIKER said, he had asked the First Commissioner of Works whether he could put any seats in Parliament Square, in the vicinity of Canning's statue, and he had instructed him to say that he was prepared to do so.

NORTH SEA FISHERIES BILL.—(No. 158.)

(The Earl of Onslow.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (The Earl of Onslow), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the object of the Bill was to carry out a Convention entered into with the Government of other Powers interested in the North Sea fisheries. The Bill sought to prevent what was becoming a very grave scandal—namely, the sale of spirituous liquors on board vessels known as "coopers." The measure was identical with the legislation proposed by the other countries interested, and the penalties were the same as those imposed by the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Onslow.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

METROPOLIS (STREET IMPROVEMENTS)—PROPOSED NEW STREET FROM PALL MALL TO TRAFALGAR SQUARE THROUGH SPRING GARDENS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD THURLOW said, he rose to ask the Government whether, now that the public were freely admitted to the Mall by Storey's Gate and that the plans for the new Admiralty and War Office were under revision, they would re-consider the question of opening a new street from the Mall to Trafalgar Square through Spring Gardens? This subject had, on a previous occasion, been under consideration by their Lordships, and he felt that he ought in some sense to apologize for again bringing it forward. Circumstances, however, had changed, and two of the objections that were urged against this proposal then could not be urged now. Eighteen months ago Storey's Gate was thrown open to the public. It had previously been urged that if this plan were adopted the traffic would increase to such an extent that the approaches to Parliament and the quietude of the park might be seriously prejudiced. The experience with regard to Storey's Gate had shown how groundless this fear was. The second objection had been removed by the postponement and revision of the plans with regard to the War and Admiralty Offices. If the Mall was continued in a straight line as far as Trafalgar Square, the cost would be comparatively trifling, and a great improvement in the Metropolis would be accomplished. He hoped the Government would favourably consider this proposal.

LORD LAMINGTON asked, what were the present plans of the Government with regard to the War and Admiralty Offices which were to have been erected in the Park?

THE EARL OF MEATH said, he hoped the Government would look with favour on this proposal. It would be greatly to be regretted if the opportunity were lost of carrying out the improvement suggested, and so making a magnificent avenue. He trusted the Government would be able to give a satisfactory answer to the question of the noble Lord (Lord Thurlow).

LORD HENNIKER said, he would not follow his noble Friend behind him (Lord Lamington) into the question of the Admiralty and War Office, as he had a short time ago explained to the House the position of affairs with regard to the proposed New Offices. The plans for the War Office depended entirely upon what Parliament settled as to the Admiralty. As to the proposal of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Thurlow), that a road should be made connecting the Mall with Trafalgar Square, when Messrs. Leeming and Leeming's plan was under consideration, the question of making a road had not been forgotten, and in the plan now proposed it had been thought of, in case it was decided to make a road there. To make a road, it would be necessary to pull down some of the houses in Spring Gardens, now occupied by different Departments of the Admiralty. Their Lordships would see that no decision could be come to on this question at present. Until these Departments were provided for in the new buildings, they must remain in their present quarters. When the new buildings were finished, it would be the best time to consider how the surplus land in Spring Gardens should be dealt with, when, too, it would, no doubt, be the best time to consider whether a road should be made as proposed by his noble Friend opposite.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he trusted that the noble Lord would be able to tell the House at no distant date that the proposal had been favourably considered. Not only would the general appearance of Trafalgar Square and the Park be improved by the new road, but the congested traffic in the neighbouring streets would be greatly relieved.

LORD HENNIKER said, that he was unfortunate, as he thought his noble Friend opposite (Lord Morley) had misunderstood him. The question had not been forgotten or unfavourably considered, and would, no doubt, be considered again at the proper time.

DEFENCES OF THE EMPIRE—FORTIFIED PORTS—ENTRY OF FOREIGN SHIPS OF WAR AND TRANSPORTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to ask whether Her Majesty's Government proposed to issue instructions to naval commanders or colonial governors with regard to the entry of foreign ships of war and transports carrying troops into fortified ports in Her Majesty's dominions? said, there were few questions of greater importance from a military and naval point of view. We possessed first-class harbours in various parts of the world, some of them being under Imperial control, and others under Colonial control. Among the former were the harbours at Singapore, Hong Kong, and Malta, and among the latter such harbours as those of Sydney and Melbourne. Some of these ports were centres of much commerce and wealth, and were of great political importance; others were in the nature of coaling stations for the Navy, and on these in time of war the safety and success of our maritime operations would depend. But whether merely centres of wealth or merely coaling stations, they were alike places of immeasurable importance. That was the first point to be borne in mind. The second point was that the world had arrived at a stage when all the conditions of naval warfare were enormously altered. Foreign squadrons now consisted of heavily-armed ironclads. While the armour a few years ago probably did not exceed some five or six inches, its thickness was now at least twice as great and the armament carried was proportionately stronger. In the event of hostile operations, if an enemy's squadron, consisting of such iron-clads, were to be within the waters of one of our great colonial ports, the place would be absolutely at its mercy. It might be said that an operation such as he contemplated could only be carried out at the outbreak of a war and in circumstances of surprise amounting almost to treachery. He did not desire to impute any unfairness or treachery to any nation, least of all to any of the great European Powers; but, on the other hand, they were bound to remember that the stake in such a case would be enormous, that the history of wars was a history of surprises, that certain grave theories had been deliberately published by eminent foreign military critics, and that modern warfare was, in all its operations, essentially rapid. Therefore, it was the bounden duty of those who were responsible for the safety of these ports to leave nothing to chance. What, he asked, was our practice with respect to the entrance of foreign warships into our colonial ports? We had, he believed, no rule upon the subject. But what was the practice of other great Powers? The Italians admitted ships into their ports in certain numbers only, and he doubted whether this privilege of limited admission did not depend upon the nationality of the vessels. The Germans excluded ships of war altogether, and the French excluded them from their chief ports—Brest and Toulon. The Russians, who at one time did admit a limited number of foreign cruisers into the port of Vladivostock, now excluded them absolutely. We alone, with everything to lose, with far more at stake than any other nation—we alone had no fixed rule, unless it was a rule permitting free entry into every one of Her Majesty's ports. By making and enforcing a rule of prohibition we should not be laying ourselves open to any charge of lack of international amity, for we should be following simply the practice of other nations. In thinking over the subject and in talking to experts it seemed to him that there were only three courses possible. The first would be to limit the number of foreign men-of-war entering a port; the second would be to assign to foreign ships particular waters within our harbours; and the third would be to exclude them altogether. A great deal might be said in favour of each one of these three courses, but his own view was that the last would be the best because it was the simplest and suited the practical and strategical conditions of every port. There was more than one port in which the presence of one single powerful ship of war might render of no avail all the fortifications around it. The last course he had named would be by far the best. At all events, it was the duty of the Government to lay down some distinct rule on this subject, and he would urge that such a rule could not be in contravention of the comity of nations. This was the time for making such a regulation. When we were on good terms with every other nation of the world, there could be no offence in following their example, but if once relations were strained between us and any other Power, such a regulation would have the semblance, at all events, of unfriendliness. He hoped Her Majesty's Government might be able to show that this matter had been under their careful consideration, and that before long they would be able to take some action upon it.

LORD ELPHINSTONE said, the noble Earl would hardly expect him to enter into the details to which he had referred, many of which were still under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. So far as the matter had gone, it was not convenient, consistently with due regard to the interests of the Public Service, to make any statement, and that being the case, no instructions had been issued to naval commanders on the subject.

The Earl of Carnarvon

TRADE OF INDIA AND THE COLONIES.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in calling attention to Parliamentary Paper "Commercial, No. 8, 1888," said, he intended to invite the attention of the House to two points only in connection with the Paper referred to. Firstly, Mr. Bryce, on the 4th of June, 1886, in answer to a Question in "another place," had denied that commercial treaties, containing Most Favoured Nation Clauses, precluded preferential treatment being given by the United Kingdom to the Colonies. Now, that answer, which was given as the opinion of Her Majesty's Government of that day, was completely contradicted by the Return Commercial, No. 8, which had just been laid before both Houses of Parliament, and which contained a memorandum from the Foreign Office which must be considered as authoritative. The only explanation he could offer for Mr. Bryce's answer was that either he gave it from his unassisted judgment, or else that he consulted the wrong person. Secondly, the Return mentioned treaties with the countries named in the Notice which were not terminable for several years—that with Greece would not be terminable till 1898; and until those treaties were worked off, or abrogated by the consent of the countries with which they were made, all the other countries having a Most Favoured Nation Clause would retain the advantages enjoyed by the countries named in the notice. Now, the Conservative Party were pledged to the policy of drawing closer the Colonies to the Mother Country, or of Colonial federation; but, with one or two exceptions, it must be said that the Leaders of the Liberal Party were fully as desirous of securing that end; and although Her Majesty's Government had concluded the affair of the New Hebrides, yet the Australian colonists were most indebted to the efforts both in and out of office of the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery) in their behalf. It is now well understood that there could be no Colonial federation without fiscal preferential treatment of the Colonies. The carrying out of this preferential treatment was therefore certain sooner or later. In April last, Mr. MacNeill, M.P., moved a Resolution, which was carried unanimously by the Ottawa branch of the Imperial Federation League—

“That the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests of the Colonies and the Mother Country would be greatly promoted by such modification in the various fiscal policies adopted within the Empire as would give to each of its members advantages in the several markets withheld from foreign countries; and the meeting respectfully suggests that Parliament should in its wisdom consider the advisability of entering into negotiations with the Imperial authorities for carrying out such a policy.”

Under these circumstances, and seeing that the United States had been offering similar advantages to the Canadians in order to detach them fiscally from the Mother Country, it was unfortunate that in negotiating these recent treaties, greater care had not been taken to avoid tying the hands of this country for a further term of years. For instance, what was the good of negotiating a Treaty with Montenegro, a country which had no seaports, and no emigrants, except a few gardeners who went to Constantinople, with the result of adding to the number of treaties by which we were hampered. The ease or difficulty of obtaining a release from those engagements would depend very much upon the amount of trade between the Colonies and the countries with which treaties had still several years to run. The country had a right to be informed on this point, and the knowledge of it would be useful to the Government; he would therefore move for the Return according to the Notice.

Moved for,

“Return showing the amount of trade between India and each of the Colonies on the one hand, and the following countries:—Equador, Greece, Italy, Montenegro, Paraguay, Portugal, Roumania, Salvador, Serbia, Uruguay, during the year 1886.”—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross) said, that so far as India was concerned there was no objection to the Motion if the words “as far as practicable” were introduced.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord Knutsford) said, on behalf of the Colonial Office, he should offer no objection to the Return, provided the words suggested by the noble Viscount were inserted. The Colonial Office desired to do everything possible to strengthen the ties between the Colonies and the Empire; but he doubted whether preferential and protective trading arrangements would have that effect.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he would accept the qualification suggested.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

“Return showing, as far as practicable, the amount of trade between India and each of the Colonies on the one hand, and the following countries:—Equador, Greece, Italy, Montenegro, Paraguay, Portugal, Roumania, Salvador, Serbia, Uruguay, during the year 1886.”

Ordered to be laid before the House.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—
MESSRS. GARDINER AND RED-MOND, R.M.—CASTLEMARTYR.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish, Sir, to make a personal explanation which will not detain the House more than a few minutes at the outside. I see reported in the newspapers an observation of the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland—a most becoming observation, I think, couched in most becoming terms—to the effect, practically, that there ought not to have been comments made in this House upon the case of the prisoners sentenced at Castlemartyr for exclusive dealing while the proceedings were in course of review in the Court of Exchequer. While entirely concurring in that observation, I wish to say that I was absolutely unaware that the proceedings either were or could be brought under review in that particular manner. It is within the cognizance of the House that they were not brought under review in the ordinary course contemplated by the Crimes Act of last year, and for this very simple reason—that none of the sentences amounted to more than one month, and, consequently, none of them gave a right of appeal. The application of habeas corpus to the Court of Exchequer was a proceeding I was not aware of; and certainly if I had been aware of it I should not have put any Question to the Government on the matter until it had been decided by the Court of Appeal.

Q U E S T I O N S.

REVENUE OF THE CROWN (SCOTLAND) —THE ANNUAL FEU DUTIES.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will state the amount which has been received from Crown vassals in Scotland during the past financial year on account of annual feu duty paid to the Crown; the amount paid to the Crown as composition of a year's rent due to the superior on the entry of singular successors; the amount paid as relief duty by heirs on succeeding, and the number of heirs who have so paid?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that the amount which has been received from Crown vassals in Scotland during the past financial year on account of annual feu duty paid to the Crown is £11,269 4s. 8d. The composition of a year's rent due to the superior on the entry of singular successors is not, as a rule, exacted by the Crown, but in lieu thereof, and as a matter of favour, the Crown usually accepts one-sixth of the old valued rent. The amount received under this head is £88 14s. 3d. The amount paid as relief duty by heirs on succeeding was £435 12s. The number of heirs who have so paid is 21.

VICTORIA PARK HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION—ALLEGED ILLEGAL DISSECTION.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will inquire into the truth of the following allegation against the authorities of the Victoria Park Hospital for Consumption:—

“That on the 23rd of April last a young man named Cornish died in the hospital, having been an in-patient for five days only. That Mr. John Cornish, of Mount Street, Bethnal Green, the father of the deceased, was unable to get the body; and, having been informed that it was to be opened, said that he would not allow it; that the Rev. Robert Loveridge, Vicar of St. Philip's, Bethnal Green, who accompanied Mr. Cornish, also warned the authorities not to touch the body; and that, notwithstanding these notices of objection, the body was dissected;”

whether, if these facts are true, an offence against the Criminal Law has been committed; and, if so, whether he will cause proceedings to be taken against the parties accused?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have inquired into this matter, and am informed by the authorities of the Hospital that it is not the fact that the father was unable to get the body. It was given to him at the customary time, on the day of the death. He expressed no objection to a post-mortem examination, inasmuch as he did not come to the Hospital until after the examination had necessarily taken place. Mr. Loveridge did not accompany Mr. Cornish, neither did he warn the authorities not to touch the body. The so-called dissection of the body was nothing else than the usual post-mortem examination, which was made in consequence of the sudden death of the patient and other unaccountable features of his case. I am unable to discover that the authorities have rendered themselves amenable to the Criminal Law.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—LIMERICK MAGISTRATES—SALE OF INDECENT PHOTOGRAPHS.

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true, as stated in The Freeman's Journal of June 14, 1888, that the Limerick Magistrates sent William Marks to prison, on Wednesday, June 6, for a month, for selling indecent photographs; whether the Lord Lieutenant granted him a free pardon; whether he was liberated after one week in gaol; who reported the case to the Lord Lieutenant, and obtained the pardon; on what ground was the pardon granted; whether it is true that the photographs would have been destroyed by order of the Lay Magistrates, but for the intervention of the Resident Magistrate, Mr. Irwin, who opposed such destruction, and contended that equally bad photographs were exhibited in the shop windows of London, Limerick, and other places; and, what course the Government intend to take with regard to future prosecutions of a similar kind?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.) in reply, said, the Resident Magistrate had reported that the statements which had appeared in the newspapers with regard to the case of William Marks, who was sent to prison at Limerick on June 6, for selling indecent photographs, were inaccurate. The magistrates first sentenced the man to imprisonment for a month. They then re-considered the case, and, owing to the absence of evidence on a particular point, marked it "no rule." The allegation that the photographs belonging to Marks would have been destroyed on the order of the Lay Magistrates were it not for the intervention of the Resident Magistrate was a pure fabrication; and the statement that the Resident Magistrate said that equally bad photographs were exhibited in Limerick and London was also untrue. Marks was also charged with carrying on the business of a pedlar without a licence. He was fined 10s. or the alternative of seven days' imprisonment. Someone paid the fine, and the prisoner was discharged in the ordinary way. The matter did not at all come under the cognizance of the Lord Lieutenant.

RUGBY HABITATION OF THE PRIMROSE LEAGUE — OBJECTIONABLE SPORTS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a report in The Rugby Advertiser, of June 16, of some sports at the recent annual fête of the Rugby Habitation of the Primrose League; whether it is true, as stated in such report, that there was an "animal race," in which several dogs (including a terrier), a lamb, and a hen competed, and that they were driven by their owners by means of strings tied to their legs; that considerable amusement was caused by the terrier going for the lamb at every opportunity; that many persons present expressed their sense of the cruelty practised; and that, in obedience to protests, the hen was eventually withdrawn from the contest; and, whether he will make any communication to the officers of the League, with a view of preventing a repetition of such practices?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. MATTHEWS) (Birmingham, E.): I have received a Report from the Police Authorities on this matter. They inform me that such a race did take place. It was not a lamb that competed, but a three-year-old Welsh sheep, and a very small terrier, which was much frightened by the sheep, and took care to keep out of its way. The hen, when brought to the post, settled herself on the grass, refused to move, and was at once taken away. The police assure me that no cruelty took place, nor was there any protest on the part of the crowd. I see nothing in the circumstances to justify or call for any further interference on my part.

LABOURERS' ALLOTMENTS ACT, 1887—BANBURY BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether in the Rules submitted by the Banbury Board of Guardians for approval under "The Labourers' Allotments Act, 1887," there is one obliging the tenants of allotments to cultivate by spade labour only, and prohibiting the use of the plough; and, whether the Local Government Board have approved such Rule?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. Ritchie) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Banbury Rural Sanitary Authority submitted to the Local Government Board a draft of Regulations which had been prepared by them with regard to allotments, and one of the proposed Regulations was that a person to whom an allotment is let shall cultivate the same by spade husbandry only. The Board, in returning the draft, raised no objection to this proposed Regulation. It is one which they believe is very usually adopted in agreements for the letting of allotments. The Regulations have not been formally approved by the Board. In the first instance, they have to be deposited for the inspection of the ratepayers; and if any persons locally interested think it desirable to make any objections to the Board with reference to the Rule in question they will be considered by the Board before the Regulations are approved by them.

CIVIL SERVANTS — EXAMINATIONS FOR FIRST CLASS CIVIL SERVICE CLERKSHIPS.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether there is any probability of an examination being held for First Class Civil Service Clerkships at an early date; and, if so, when?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (A Lord of the Treasury) (Wigton) (who replied) said: No, Sir; it is not probable that any examination can be held at an early date; and, looking to the present requirements of the Civil Service, it is not possible for me to say when the next will be held.

WAR OFFICE — THE ARMY CLOTHING FACTORY, PIMLICO — PIECE WORKERS.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.) asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office, Whether Rule 18 of the Rules and Regulations for Piece Workers in the Royal Army Clothing Factory, at Pimlico, which runs as follows:—

“Loan Societies and Clubs for various purposes must not be carried on upon the premises without the special authority of the Director of Clothing,” is intended to apply to the branch of the Tailoresses' Trade Union existing among workers in that factory; and, whether it will prevent officers of that Society from collecting contributions from members after work hours?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY (Mr. Brodrick) (Surrey, Guildford): The Rule does apply to the Tailoresses' Trade Union; but it does not prevent its officers from collecting contributions from members after work hours outside the building.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — LOUGHREA BOARD OF GUARDIANS—SANITARY OFFICER—ELECTION OF MR. PETER SWEENY.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What was the date on which Mr. Peter Sweeny was elected by the Loughrea Board of Guardians sanitary officer of the Union; what is the usual time it takes for the Local Government Board to consider elections of this kind; and, what is the specific nature of the objection, if any, the Central Board can make to the election of Mr. Sweeny?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. Balfour) (Manchester, E.), in reply, said, the date of the election was May 20. There was no usual time for the consideration of such elections by the Local Government Board, who conveyed their decision as soon as practicable. Peter Sweeny had been imprisoned for three weeks in Galway Gaol; and the Board did not regard him as a fit and proper person to hold the office to which he had been appointed.

MR. SHEEHY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what was the charge for which Mr. Sweeny was imprisoned?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the charge was for carrying arms without a licence. In 1882 this man was twice in gaol on suspicion, the suspicion being in one of these cases that he had been accessory to murder.

MR. SHEEHY: All Mr. Sweeny was convicted for was for having powder for carrying on his ordinary business.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—DISMISSAL OF DALY, PRISON WARDER AT SLIGO.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Daly, the prison warder who was dismissed at Sligo, was off duty from 2 p.m. till 9.30 p.m. on the evening of January 30, the day and time in which the prohibited articles were found in a certain prisoner's cell; whether Daly was on that evening, when he went on duty, asked for an explanation for the articles complained of being found in the prisoner's cell; whether he answered that before he went off duty he searched the prisoner's cell, and found nothing inadmissible in it, and that he left it all right; whether the prisoner in question was ever asked as to who was or who was not guilty of introducing into the prison the articles complained of; and, whether there was any evidence whatever to show Daly was the culprit, beyond the fact that the objectionable articles were found in the prisoner's cell; and, if not, whether he will re-open the inquiry, so as to enable the prisoner in question to come forward and state on oath whether it was or not Daly who brought these things in to him?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The General Prisons Board report that the statements in the first three paragraphs are substantially correct. The prisoner does not appear to have been questioned on the matter. As regards the last paragraph, the grounds on which the man was dismissed were that he was responsible for the presence of prohibited articles in a prisoner's cell of which he was at the time in charge, a responsibility equally attaching to him whether it was the result of wilful connivance or of culpable negligence on his part.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he regards the inquiry as satisfactory or complete, considering that the prisoner, the only person who could give a satisfactory explanation, was not examined?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I presume the gentleman who held the inquiry satisfied himself that an examination of the prisoner was not necessary.

MR. SHEEHY: Will the right hon. gentleman give the prisoner in question the opportunity of swearing on oath that the man had nothing at all to do with the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not intend to have the matter re-opened.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POST OFFICE AT DALYSTOWN, LOUGHREA.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he received on the 6th or 7th instant a Memorial, largely and influentially signed, from the inhabitants of Dalystown, Loughrea, asking that a rural post office be erected in Dalystown; and, what, if any, has been the nature of the answer he has given to the memorialists?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University), in reply, said, he had received the Memorial referred to, and was giving it his careful consideration.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—ARRESTS AT LOUGHREA.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the seven merchants of Loughrea who were taken out of their beds on the morning of the 14th instant, on a charge of conspiracy under the ordinary law, are to be prosecuted under the ordinary law or before a Court constituted under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; whether the conspiracy of which they are accused is of recent date; and, if not, what is the time this alleged conspiracy existed; and, whether any other and what, if any, prosecutions under the ordinary law were instituted in connection with this alleged conspiracy, and what was the result of these prosecutions?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The District Inspector of Constabulary reports that four only of the defendants referred to belonged to Loughrea. The trial will be under the ordinary law at Assizes. The conspiracy has been going on since 1879, the object being to compel a man to surrender an evicted farm which he had taken. True bills for larceny of hay from the farm in question were found at last Sligo Winter Assizes against four of the persons now referred to, and eight others; but, owing to the absence of the principal witness, the trial was postponed to the Galway Spring Assizes, and then further postponed to the Summer Assizes.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I should like to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland, under what circumstances the police in Ireland handcuffed these men, who were untried prisoners?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): With reference to that matter of fact, I must ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to put a Question on the Paper.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask, with reference to this case of conspiracy arising in 1879, whether these merchants were arrested in their beds at 3 o'clock in the morning upon the assumption that they were about to leave their businesses and their families and run away from the charge?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the hon. Member rather misapprehended what he had said. He did not say that the conspiracy took place in 1879. What he said was that the conspiracy began in 1879, and continued down to the present day. He presumed the police found it necessary to arrest these men at the hour named, because they anticipated that they might have escaped if they had not been taken in that way.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked, would the right hon. Gentleman give a further assurance, in addition to the assurance he gave the other day, that the case of untried prisoners would receive the immediate attention of the Irish Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the question of the accommodation for untried prisoners was being looked into, he believed, in England; and he was making in Ireland an inquiry parallel to that which was being conducted in this country.

LAW AND POLICE (SCOTLAND)—SUSPICIOUS DEATH OF JOHN MACKAY, SOUTH HARRIS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he has completed the further inquiries recently promised into the case of John Mackay, some time ago found dead and half-naked in the Island of South Harris, whose death was reported by the police as due to exposure, but whose mother asserted that his body when found showed stabs in two places, and other marks of violence indicative of foul play; and, if he would state the date on which Mackay's body was found; the date of the inquiry on which the first Police Report was based, and by whom the inquiry was conducted; the date at which the medical examination of the body was made by Dr. Stewart; and the dates of any visit or visits made to the Island by the Procurator Fiscal for the purpose of inquiring into the case?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I have completed the inquiry, and am unable to find any evidence to justify the institution of criminal proceedings. The body was found on January 5. Owing to the violent storm prevailing at the time, the Inspector of Police and the Deputy Procurator Fiscal representing the Procurator Fiscal, who was storm-stayed in the Island of Barra, were unable to reach the spot till the 11th. They at once made an inquiry and reported. Application was made for exhumation of the body, but the Sheriff Substitute declined to order it.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — DISMISSAL OF OFFICIALS—CASE OF P. LOUGHRY, RATE COLLECTOR.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the rule or usage of the Local Government Board to dismiss, by sealed order, Poor Law officials in Ireland, without any previous communication with the Local Board of Guardians; what offence was Mr. Patrick Loughry, rate collector in the Tulla Union, charged with, which resulted in a sentence of 14 days' imprisonment, for which he was dismissed by sealed order of the Local Government Board; what was the date of his trial, and the date of his dismissal; whether it is a fact that the Guardians have advertised for a successor to Mr. Loughry, that no candidate has presented himself, and that no rates are being collected in the five Divisions formerly under his charge; whether he is aware that in consequence of this the Tulla Board of Guardians have been compelled to refuse out-door relief to applicants for it, and that the duties thrown upon poor rate collectors in Ireland under the Franchise Act are undischarged in this district, and a large number of electors thereby disfranchised; and, whether he will lay upon the Table the Correspondence between the Guardians and the Local Government Board on the subject of Mr. Loughry's dismissal?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The

Local Government Board have occasionally acted as indicated, the case being one which they deemed it right to take entirely into their own hands, and to deal with without consulting the Guardians, and for which they have full statutable authority. Loughry appears to have been prosecuted under the ordinary law, on January 23, for taking part in an unlawful assembly. He was dismissed on April 5. It is a fact that the Guardians have advertised for a successor, with the result stated. The Local Inspector reports that the Guardians have been able to give almost no out-door relief since October, 1887; but this has been owing to the general financial condition of the Union, and not to the cessation in the collection in the district referred to. The duties under the Franchise Act are not being discharged in the particular district. I am, however, advised that payment of rates to any person authorized by the Guardians to receive them will have the effect of preventing disfranchisement; and that it would be lawful for them to authorize the Clerk of the Union to receive rates which may be tendered to him before July 1 from the collecting district which is vacant.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.): May I ask whether in the case of Wilson, the Clerk of the Limerick Union, the Local Government Board refused to dismiss him, after they had become aware that his accounts were inaccurate to the extent of £200, until they first consulted the Guardians; and with respect to this case of Loughry, I wish to ask whether the unlawful assembly was simply a meet of the hunt of the local harriers; and, also, whether the real offence was on his receiving a forged letter from Head-Constable O'Callaghan, enclosing £10 as a bribe if he would give certain information to the police, that he instead sent the money to the Tenants' Defence Fund?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the Question about the Limerick Union, the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to put it on the Paper. With regard to the Question about Loughry, his offence was not simply hunting with the local harriers. Neither, as far as I know, was any cognizance taken of the incident of the letter to which the hon.

Gentleman refers. I am totally ignorant of the circumstances, the accuracy of which I greatly doubt.

MR. COX said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the first paragraph of the Question; whether it is the rule of order or usage for the Local Government Board to dismiss by sealed order without consulting the Guardians; or whether, if the right hon. Gentleman would refuse to publish the Correspondence or lay it upon the Table, he would state if it was a fact that the Guardians at the meeting refused to deem it their duty to let the Local Government Board know that it was the belief of the Guardians that no eligible person would apply for the office so long as the sealed order with Mr. Balfour's signature to it remained in force?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had no knowledge on the subject; but if the hon. Gentleman put a Notice on the Paper he would inquire.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Would the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to state what the unlawful assembly was?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Sir, I cannot give full information on the point; but I can say that the unlawful assembly was of an intimidatory character directed to tenants.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

INDIA—THE IRRAWADDY FLOTILLA COMPANY.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he can now give the promised information as to the Irrawaddy Flotilla Company?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Oatham), in reply, said, the information had not yet arrived. The Return would take some time to prepare; but it might be delivered by the mail which was expected to-morrow.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—GREENWICH PARK.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether at the termination of the present tenancy of the Ranger's Lodge, Greenwich Park, the 15 acres, or thereabouts, of the 16 acres 28 perches at present attached to the Lodge can be thrown open to the public?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The subject raised by the Question of the hon. Member is an important one, and I shall take care to inquire into it carefully.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA — GOVERNOR BROOME AND CHIEF JUSTICE ONSLOW.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he is now in a position to give the result of the Privy Council decision on the dispute between Governor Broome and Chief Justice Onslow of Western Australia; and, what course the Government have decided on in regard to Governor Broome?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Report of the Committee of the Privy Council, which was approved by the Queen, found that of the three charges formulated against the Chief Justice, the first afforded no sufficient ground for a formal charge, though the Chief Justice had acted indiscreetly; that the conduct imputed to the Chief Justice in the second charge arose apparently from irritation produced by the first charge; and although the language of the Chief Justice was characterized by much impropriety, yet, as it was not then published, it did not in itself afford adequate ground for a charge intended to lead to suspension from office; that the third charge was more serious, as the Chief Justice had given for publication language of great animosity to the Governor, as well as confidential information, which he had no right so to communicate, and that on this charge the Committee had had some hesitation in not recommending the confirmation of the suspension of the Chief Justice; but, as no misconduct of a moral character, or connected with judicial duties, had been imputed to him, they recommended that the suspension be removed. Her Majesty's Government have not felt themselves called upon to take any action with regard to the Governor.

Mr. Bradlaugh

OPEN SPACES (METROPOLIS)—PRIMROSE HILL.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is aware of the unsatisfactory condition of Primrose Hill, that the paths are worn away and denuded of grass, and no adequate efforts are made to preserve the property as originally laid out when converted into a park; and, what steps he proposes to take for the purpose of restoring and preserving the enclosure of Primrose Hill as a recreation ground for the benefit of the large number of persons who frequent it as a popular place of resort?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University), in reply, said, he was well aware of the condition of Primrose Hill from frequent personal observation; and he could not admit that, considering the nature of the case, it could fairly be described as unsatisfactory. The grass near the paths was in places worn away; and, no doubt, this deterioration could, to some extent, be remedied by putting up cross hurdles and other fencing, and thus keeping people more strictly within bounds. But this would be to treat Primrose Hill as a private park or garden, rather than as a place open, as it now practically was, for thoroughfare at all hours of the day and night to the public generally. The Hill looked very well in the spring time; but he was afraid that he could not promise to take any steps which would prevent the grass from being worn away in the dry weather.

MR. LAWSON asked, if the First Commissioner would give orders that Primrose Hill should be watered at night?

MR. PLUNKET: It was well watered last night.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—ADMISSION TO BAIL.

MR. GILHOLLY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether, in the interval between the arrest of a person charged with an offence under "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," and the hearing of a charge, any magistrate has the power to accept bail for the appearance of such person?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN) (Dublin University): There are no provisions in the Statute enabling Justices of the Peace generally to accept bail under the circumstances mentioned in the Question. In the case of a prosecution under the Act referred to, any person arrested under warrant, on being brought before a Resident Magistrate, may be admitted to bail, should the magistrate be of opinion that this course should be taken.

In further reply to Mr. GILHOLLY,

MR. MADDEN said, that under the Crimes Act one Resident Magistrate could admit to bail, although the Court of Summary Jurisdiction consisted of two Resident Magistrates.

MR. GILHOLLY asked, whether the provisions of the Petty Sessions Acts were repealed; or whether they were incorporated with the Criminal Law and Procedure Act of last year?

MR. MADDEN said, that the provisions of the Petty Sessions Act were not repealed by the Criminal Law and Procedure Act of last year; but they did not apply to the case mentioned in the Question.

MR. O'HEA (Donegal, W.) asked, whether it was not the habitual practice of Resident Magistrates to supersede the function of the ordinary magistrates in the cases of persons arrested and waiting for trial under the Coercion Act?

MR. MADDEN: That necessarily results from what I have stated to the House—that an application under the Act of last year must be made to a Resident Magistrate, but not necessarily to a full Court of Summary Jurisdiction, because a single magistrate has power to act. The magistrate acting must be a Resident Magistrate.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) inquired, what section or sub-section of the Act debarred the ordinary magistrate under the Coercion Act from taking bail?

MR. MADDEN: No section of the Act debars an ordinary magistrate from taking bail; but the ordinary magistrate has not the jurisdiction under the Act which the hon. Member supposes him to possess.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—ENGINEER VOLUNTEER CORPS.

SIR CHARLES PALMER (Durham, Jarrow) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether officers of the Line are being appointed to Engineer Volunteer Corps; and, if so, whether this arises from paucity of Royal Engineer officers available for such appointments, or lack of advantages necessary to induce them to leave their own corps to become adjutants of Volunteer Corps?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Line officers have been appointed as adjutants of Engineer Volunteer Corps in consequence of the paucity of Engineer officers available. Officers of the Royal Engineers are not seconded when holding extra-regimental appointments. Eight officers have been added to the corps for this purpose; but as the Engineer Auxiliary Forces require 18 adjutants some must be provided from other sources.

SUGAR BOUNTIES—THE NEGOTIATIONS.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give any further information concerning the progress of the negotiations concerning sugar bounties; and, whether he can say at what time the Papers relating to the Conference on that question will be laid upon the Table?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): No further information can yet be given. The Revised Draft of the Convention prepared in the last meeting of the Conference is under the consideration of the Governments concerned.

In further answer to Mr. PICTON,

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, that Papers were never presented to Parliament until negotiations of this kind were completed. The Conference would meet again in August, when the result of the reference to the Governments would be known. Papers could, of course, not be presented until after that time.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked, if the Prorogation of Parliament took place before that time, what opportunity the House would have of discussing the matter?

[No reply.]

SUGAR BOUNTIES CONFERENCE—THE PAPERS.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury,

Whether he will undertake that Papers containing a full account of the negotiations concerning the sugar bounties, and of the proceedings of the Conference, shall be laid before the House, so as to give ample time for considering and discussing them before any legislation on the subject is attempted in this country?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.) (who replied) said: Full information will be supplied to Parliament before any legislation is proposed.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said, he really must ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would undertake that there would be no legislation on the subject until they had the Papers?

SIR JAMES FERGUSON: I have already said so.

MR. ILLINGWORTH asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman could say if the statement in The Daily News was correct, that the sugar bounties for the coming year would be maintained in France?

SIR JAMES FERGUSON: I have no information on that point. Perhaps the hon. Member will put a Notice on the Paper.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—LONDONDERRY GAOL.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that there is inside the main entrance to Londonderry Gaol a large hall and also a large waiting room formerly used by visitors; whether he is aware that people who go there to visit their political friends are first asked their business, and then are ordered by an official to the street to wait there for a very long time; and, whether he will say if he has given those instructions to the Governor; and, if not, will he explain by whom they were given?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The General Prisons Board report that for a few days visitors were not admitted inside the outer door of the prison while waiting. Such instructions were not issued by the Board, the Governor having acted on a suggestion made by the Inspector of Prisons. On learning the fact, on the 18th, the Prisons Board at once issued directions to the Governor to resume the former practice of giving visitors immediate admission, there being ample accommodation for them in the large entrance hall and in the office.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DEFALCATIONS IN BALLYMENA UNION.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is he aware that, in the recent defalcations in Ballymena Union, although a bogus bank book had been kept from September, 1885, till 1888, there was only one bank book for the six years preceding; that, while frauds were being constantly perpetrated during that period, the accounts were certified by Colonel Studdert as being correct; that leaves had been torn from the ledger and others pasted in; that private marks had been put upon the margins opposite sums of £40 and £50 without exciting the suspicion of the auditor; that the master's and relieving officer's receipt and expenditure books had been partly, if not altogether, kept by the clerk; and, if his attention has been directed to a Resolution which was passed unanimously by the Guardians on the subject; and if, under the circumstances, he will grant the sworn inquiry demanded?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): A Resolution was received yesterday by the Local Government Board, adopted by the Board of Guardians of the Ballymena Union, asking for an inquiry in regard to the manner in which the accounts of the Union have been audited. Colonel Studdert has been called upon for an explanation before deciding whether the inquiry should be granted.

In reply to The LORD MAYOR of DUBLIN (Mr. Sexton) (Belfast, W.),

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that, as far as he understood the Question, the hon. Gentleman asked him to give an opinion on Colonel Studdert's behaviour before Colonel Studdert himself had had an opportunity of explaining his conduct, and he (Mr. A. J. Balfour) must decline to do so.

INDIA—CIRCULAR No. 5, ISSUED BY THE INSPECTOR GENERAL OF POLICE, BENGAL.

MR. SLAGG (Burnley) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has now seen the "confidential" Circular No. 5, issued by Mr. J. C. Veasey, Inspector General of Police, Bengal, dated Calcutta, December 30, 1887, which directs the police, among other subjects, to scrutinize and report weekly upon—

"Everything, however apparently trivial, that can have a political significance; comments on laws and Government measures; affairs in independent or semi-independent Native States, and rumours regarding their constitution; objects and proceedings of Native Societies, whether established for political or ostensibly for other objects; political or mass meetings, their origin, organization, and result as to public feeling in the neighbourhood, &c.;"

and, whether the Secretary of State will consider the advisability of directing the Circular to be withdrawn?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): No official copy has yet been received. In accordance with a promise I gave on June 7, a despatch has been sent to the Government of India on this subject; and, as soon as a reply is received, the matter will be considered by the Secretary of State in Council.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT—PAUPER CHILDREN AS "HALF-TIMERS" IN FACTORIES.

MR. LEES (Oldham) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is contrary to law for Guardians of the poor to allow pauper children to work as "half-timers" in the factories; whether he is aware that the Lancashire cotton spinning industry can only be properly mastered by those who are employed in it at an early age as "half-timers;" and, whether he sees any prospect of being able to propose any alteration of the law in this respect?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The proposal which has been submitted to the Local Government Board is that children, while they are maintained as pauper inmates of the workhouse, should be allowed to leave the workhouse during part of the day for the purpose of being employed in factories. The Board have stated that such an arrangement is opposed to the principles which should guide the Guardians in the administration of relief. It appears to the Board to be entirely opposed to the principles of the Poor Law Amendment Act that persons, while maintained in the workhouse at the cost of the rates, should be employed in factories, and thus compete with independent labour. If such an arrangement were legalized as regards factory work, the adoption of the same principle could not be resisted with respect to the employment of workhouse inmates in agricultural and other labour. I cannot hold out any expectation that an alteration of the law will be proposed.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE AT SIERRA LEONE —EXECUTION OF NATIVES.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR (Leicester) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether three Natives named W. T. G. Caulker, T. O. Caulker, and Lahai, were tried in the Colony of Sierra Leone for murder, convicted, recommended to mercy by the jury, and, notwithstanding that recommendation and much local feeling in their favour, hanged at Shaingay on the 6th instant; whether the murder charged was the levying of war by one Native Chief against another; whether the Government has received information of the trial, and sanctioned the disregard of the recommendation of the jury; whether the levying of war in question took place in British territory proper or in the Protectorate, and what was the jurisdiction to try by English law for murder in a case of intertribal warfare; and, whether the above-named W. T. G. Caulker was the same man who, some years since, was released by order of the Home Government from an illegal imprisonment by the Colonial Authority, an imprisonment which had lasted four years?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): Three Natives, so named, have been tried for murder at Sierra Leone and convicted, and were executed at Shaingay on the 6th instant. The Secretary of State has no official information that they were recommended to mercy, or as to local feeling in the case. The murder appears to have been committed in an attack on Shaingay in the course of an insurrection against a Native Chief, the circumstances of which are set forth in the despatches presented to Parliament in September last, C.5236. Her Majesty's Government received information that the trial was taking place, and has been informed by telegraph of the conviction and execution of these men, but has not yet received a Report of the trial. The Governor has been called upon for a full Report. The murder appears to have taken place in British territory, and the Colonial Court had jurisdiction to try for all crimes committed in the Colony. W. T. G. Caulker was in 1878 taken by the Governor of Sierra Leone out of the hands of a Native Chief, a relative, who was about to put him to death, and was detained at Freetown—partly for his own protection and partly to prevent an outbreak of war—until 1881, when he was allowed to return to his own district in accordance with the terms of a reconciliation between him and his family effected by the Governor. As was stated by the then Under Secretary of State on August 23, 1881, he was detained as a State prisoner without any clear warrant of law. His release was not directly ordered by the Home Government, but was preceded by an inquiry by the Secretary of State.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH OF BOHER, CO. LIMERICK.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been directed to a paragraph which appeared in The Cork Herald of last Saturday, which states that the windows of the Roman Catholic Church of Boher, County Limerick, were broken a few days before, it is believed, by Emergency men; and, whether he will direct a Resident Magistrate to hold a sworn inquiry, under "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," in order to discover the perpetrators of the alleged outrage?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The District Inspector of Constabulary reports that panes of glass were broken with stones on the night of the 14th instant in Boher Roman Catholic Chapel; and on the same night panes of glass were broken in a similar manner in the Protestant Church at Caherconlish, two miles from Boher. The offences are believed to have been perpetrated by a tramp named Patrick Sweeny, not by Emergency men. Sweeny was arrested, charged with the offence, and remanded on the 17th instant for eight days. The parish priest spoke to his congregation about the breaking of the glass, and said—

"No notice should be taken of the matter; it was the act of a poor demented person."

WAR OFFICE—REMOVAL OF THE AYR-SHIRE ARTILLERY TO PLYMOUTH.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Ayrshire Artillery were lately removed from Ayrshire to Plymouth; is it true that this regiment has not been removed from Scotland for 12 years, and that in its number there are 200, or a considerable number, of Parliamentary voters; was the regiment removed before or after the death of the late Mr. Campbell, Member for the Ayr Burghs; was a remonstrance made to the authorities about the removal of the regiment on the eve of a Parliamentary election; and, if so, can he state why this remonstrance was not attended to?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): There is no Militia corps of Ayrshire Artillery. The Ayrshire Infantry Militia will train at Ayr next month. Probably the hon. Member refers to the Argyll and Bute Artillery, which was selected in December last to train this year at Plymouth. The actual orders for its embarkation were issued on May 17. No application was received asking that any change in the arrangements should be made; but if it had been it is improbable that it could have been acceded to.

MR. MACNEILL asked, whether in the Argyll and Bute Artillery Militia there were 200 voters of the Ayr Burghs; and, whether the regiment had long been stationed at Campbeltown, one of the Ayr Burghs?

MR. E. STANHOPE: With regard to the number of voters in the regiment I have no information, and I do not intend to ask. I believe that the regiment has been stationed at Campbeltown; but the Military Authorities decided in December last that this year it should be drilled at Plymouth.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Are we to understand that the Military Authorities have the power of disfranchising a number of soldier voters by removing them from the constituency in which they have a vote at a time when an election contest is going on?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid that military considerations override every other consideration, and that those who are in the service of the Government—whether in the Army or the Militia—must expect to go wherever they are called by the Military Authorities.

In reply to Mr. MAC NEILL,

MR. E. STANHOPE said, it was purely a matter for the Military Authorities to decide; and until this Question was put down he personally had no knowledge whatever on the subject.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887—ARRESTS AT CURASS, KANTURK.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. SEXTON) (Belfast, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that in Ireland lately the police have resorted to the practice of taking men out of their beds in the dead of night, mostly upon warrants for charges under the Coercion Act; why the arrests of six tenant farmers at Curass, near Kanturk, on the 14th instant, were made at 2 a.m., although the occurrence which was the subject of the charge dated so far back as March 23, and although, after the men had been held in custody at the police barrack for about 20 hours, the police assented to their release on bail; and, whether the Government will instruct the Irish police not to cause unnecessary confusion and alarm in households, and especially to women and children, by making arrests of persons of respectable condition in the dead of night?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am informed that arrests are not made at night, except in cases where the responsible officer has reason to suppose that arrest would otherwise be evaded or rescue attempted. The District Inspector of Constabulary was of opinion he could not execute the warrants in the case in question were he to attempt to do so later in the day.

MR. SEXTON said, that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the third paragraph of the Question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not think there was any necessity whatever to issue the instructions referred to, for he had no reason to believe the Irish police did cause unnecessary alarm and confusion in households.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked, if people in the neighbourhood of Curass had not been summoned under the Coercion Act, and attended the Court in answer to the summons?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the facts might be as the hon. Gentleman stated. He had no knowledge of them; but, even if true, he did not see how they affected the issue raised by the Question.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—JUDICIAL RENTS — SUB-COMMISSIONERS AT MANORHAMILTON.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.) had the following Question on the Paper:—To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is in accordance with the spirit and letter of the Land Law Act of 1881, that the Chairman of the Sub-Commissioners should fix the judicial rent whilst in Court, on the mere testimony of a landlord's valuator, and without at all visiting the farm affected by such rent; whether, at the late sitting of the Sub-Commissioners, Mr. E. O. M'Devitt in the chair, at Manorhamilton, County Leitrim, the case of "Sarah Maguire v. Owen Wynne" came on for hearing; and, whether the Chairman fixed the judicial rent on the basis of the old rent; and, if so, whether the Government will afford facilities to Sarah Maguire for a re-hearing of her case? The hon. Gentleman complained that the Question was not in the form in which he handed it in. It ought to be—"Order!"

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman will put the Question as it appears on the Paper.

Mr. CONWAY: But it does not appear on the Paper as it ought to be.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will content himself with putting it as it appears on the Paper.

Mr. CONWAY: Then I decline to put the Question.

CUSTOMS HOUSE—THE STATISTICAL DEPARTMENT—SPECIAL PAY OF WRITERS.

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, as the Committee of Inquiry into the Statistical Department of the Customs House recommended a special rate of pay to the writers employed therein, and several months have since elapsed, it is intended to adopt such recommendation; and, if so, when the same will be brought into operation; what is the reason for the prolonged delay in respect of the promotion of writers to the Lower Division who are employed in those Offices which have not been dealt with under the provisions of the Treasury Minute of December, 1886, and who, fulfilling all the conditions laid down in that Minute, have been accordingly recommended; and, when the writers employed in the Customs Outposts (similarly situated) may expect to be informed of the decision in their case?

Sir HERBERT MAXWELL (A Lord of the Treasury) (Wigton) (who replied) said: Very considerable changes in the organisation of the Customs Statistical Department have been proposed by a Committee; but we are not prepared to carry out organic changes until the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments has considered the clerical establishments of the Customs. In the meantime, we contemplate an ad interim arrangement, which we hope will be shortly ready for adoption. We are about to issue our decision in the case of copyists in the Local Government Board. The other cases outstanding are cases of appeal, in which our objections have not as yet been removed. As regards certain copyists at the outposts who have been brought before us for favourable consideration, we are still in correspondence with the Commissioner of Customs as to the proper method of dealing with their claims. I regret there has, undoubtedly, been some delay; but we hope to be able to settle it in a few days.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD—AMALGAMATION OF BOROUGHES.

Mr. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he is aware that, for purposes of the London School Board, the boroughs of Paddington, Marylebone, Hampstead, and St. Pancras are amalgamated; and, whether tenement occupiers are entitled to vote at these elections; if so, why in Paddington they are precluded by the parochial authorities, whilst in the other boroughs they are allowed?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): For the purposes of the London School Board the Division of Marylebone does, I believe, comprise the Parliamentary boroughs stated. It is provided in the Second Schedule of the Elementary Education Act, 1873, that every ratepayer whose name appears in the Rate Book at a particular date shall be entitled to vote, and no person shall be entitled to vote whose name does not so appear; but beyond that the Department have no information to give.

WAR OFFICE—RAVENSCOURT PARK, HAMMERSMITH.

Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to use any portion of the Ravenscourt Park, Hammersmith, for drilling or military exercises; and, if so, whether this will have the effect of excluding the ratepayers of Hammersmith from ground purchased for the purposes of public recreation?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I have been in communication with my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Hammersmith (General Goldsworthy), and I have also received a Memorial on this subject. Looking to the local circumstances, it is exceedingly unlikely that Ravenscourt Park will be used for any military purpose, except, perhaps, for the local Volunteers. But I do not think I should be justified, on national grounds, in assenting to a bye-law which would exclude the military from the Park under any conceivable circumstances.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—EVICTIION AT CLOGHER.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following account of an eviction in Ireland, which is taken from a London paper:—

"An eviction was carried out yesterday on the property of Mr. Montroy Gledstones Fardross, Clogher, telegraphs our Dublin correspondent. Nearly 40 police were in attendance. The evicted family numbers six members. One, a blind boy, received the last sacrament last evening, and the father, an old man of 80 years, was so weak and ill, as to appear utterly unconscious of what was going on around him. Another son besought the Sub-Sheriff (Mr. McKelvey) to delay the removal of the father from bed till the parish priest might be sent for, as the arrival of Mr. McKelvey had taken the family by surprise, but the officer was inexorable. The old man was then transferred from his bed to a cart, in which he was conveyed to the house of a son-in-law, where he received the last sacrament immediately afterwards from the parish priest ;"

and, whether it is not in the power of the Government to refuse to allow the forces of the Crown to be used in evicting persons under such painful circumstances?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I am sorry that the reports which I have received are not sufficiently full to enable me to answer this Question to-day. Would the hon. Gentleman kindly put the Question down for to-morrow?

MR. W. REDMOND: Mr. Speaker, this is the second time that I have put this Question; and I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the information which has been given to the public in the newspapers to-day — information which the Government, as appears from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, could not get, although the public have it to-day? The Question I wish to ask is this—

MR SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman has just stated that he is not in a position to give an answer to-day, but that he will give it to-morrow. If the hon. Gentleman is asking a Question now which is not on the Paper he should give Notice of it.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman a Question as to a matter which appears in the newspapers in connection with this case?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must give Notice of the Question.

MR. W. REDMOND: But the man is dying.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. W. REDMOND: But the man is dying. ["Order!"] It is very hard that a man is turned out to die.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. W. REDMOND: Turned out to die on the roadside.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

ADMIRALTY—TORPEDO NET DEFENCE COMMITTEE—EXPERIMENTS.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true, as reported, that in the final experiments on May 17, carried out by the "Torpedo Net Defence Committee" at Portsmouth, it was conclusively shown that wooden booms entirely failed, although increased from 10 to 12 inches diameter, the same being broken or blown away from their heel attachments to the side of the Resistance when subjected to the explosive action of 92 lb. of gun-cotton against nets suspended from such booms; whether in all the previous experiments, from September, 1886, to the present time, wooden booms have invariably failed when exposed to ordinary explosions of gun-cotton against nets; whether, notwithstanding these failures, it has been decided to fit the Invincible and other ships with similar heavy wooden booms of from 20 to 24 cwt. in preference to steel booms of an improved type, weighing under 10 cwt., as proposed by Mr. Bullivant; whether the estimated cost of steel booms is from £20 to £22, as against £28 to £30 for wooden booms of 12 inches diameter; whether it is true that the "Net Defence Committee" and Dockyard officials are in favour of steel booms being fitted to Her Majesty's ships; and, if so, why are wooden booms still ordered to be used when naval opinion outside the Admiralty Office is known to be in favour of steel booms, as being less than half the weight, less costly, more durable and efficient; and, whether the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty will be pleased to order a further trial of steel booms to establish beyond doubt their superiority over wood, as claimed for them by authority, before expending further moneys on wooden ones?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): During the present year five experiments, with a view to testing the efficiency of wooden booms, have been carried out. In one case only was the boom broken, though some defects in the ironwork and rigging were developed on each of these occasions; and, excepting in the case of the broken boom, the injury was not of a nature to render the net defence inefficient, but the damage was such as could be readily repaired. The statement that the wooden booms entirely failed cannot, therefore, be supported. It has been decided to fit the Invincible with wooden booms, and the work is in progress. The estimated cost of steel booms is slightly greater than that of wooden booms. It is true that the Net Defence Committee recommended the use of steel booms; but there is a great divergence of opinion on the subject. Until further experience has been gained by actual use of the present fittings at sea, it is not proposed to make any changes; but the matter will be kept in view, and should it be satisfactorily established that steel booms are in all respects more efficient than wood, the Admiralty will be prepared to substitute them for the wooden ones now in use.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) wished to know whether the weight of the boom was correctly given in the third paragraph of the Question?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am not aware that those figures are actually correct; but, no doubt, these wooden booms are heavier than steel booms.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) inquired, whether the noble Lord would give the names of the officials who were opposing the introduction of steel booms, so that a Motion might be made dealing with the question of their continuance in the Public Service?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, it was most improper that Questions should be put to him for the purpose of advertising inventions.

SCOTTISH SALMON FISHERIES— LEGISLATION.

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT (Roxburgh) asked the Lord Advocate, whether he still intends to introduce during the present Session a Bill dealing with Scottish Salmon Fisheries?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): Her Majesty's Government have desired, in framing a Bill to deal with the Scottish Salmon Fisheries, to make it a thorough and complete measure. To do this has involved much labour and much correspondence with various parts of the country. The Bill is now practically ready, and it is the intention to introduce it this Session.

NAVY—PHOTOGRAPHIC CHARTING OF THE HEAVENS.

MR. CROSSLEY (York, W.R., Sowerby) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If the Government has approved of the recommendation of the Astronomer Royal and the Board of Visitors of the Greenwich Observatory, made both in 1887 and 1888, that a photographic equatorial refracting telescope be constructed for the purpose of taking part in the international photographic charting of the heavens; and, whether orders have been given for the construction of such an instrument?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The recommendation of the Astronomer Royal is under the consideration of the Government. There has been considerable delay owing to the necessity of having to refer twice to the Observatory at the Cape of Good Hope with regard to their requirements, it having been decided that the expenditure for the two stations should be considered together.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—THE COUNTY COUNCILS—PAPERS.

MR. CALEB WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh) asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he can inform the House when the Papers showing the number of County Councillors to be elected by the respective County Divisions will be distributed to the Members; and, whether the population of each Division will also be given?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. BIRCHALL) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Bill contemplates that the number of members of the County Council should be fixed by the Local Government Board. Our proposals in this respect have been printed, and a large number of copies placed in the Vote Office, so that any Member may, on application, obtain a copy. The Electoral Divisions are to be determined in the case of a borough returning more than one member by the Town Council of the borough, and in the case of the rest of the county by the Court of Quarter Sessions. Each Electoral Division is to return one member; and until these Divisions have been constituted no particulars can be given with regard to them.

WAR OFFICE—FORTRESS ENGINEERS AT EDINBURGH AND LEITH.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the decision against the formation of the corps of Fortress Engineers at Edinburgh and Leith, as proposed in the Estimates, has been arrived at in consequence of difference of local military opinion on the subject; whether this opposition is due to any lack of men willing to join the corps; whether the Military Authorities at the War Office are still favourable to the formation of such a corps, and whether its formation is an essential part of the scheme of defence of the Eastern Coast; and, whether, in view of the public interests involved, he will still endeavour to carry out his original intention.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The decision against the formation of the corps was arrived at on the advice of the Local Military Authorities. Its formation, though not essential to the defence of the Eastern Coast, would have been desirable; but, in view of the local objections, I did not think it advisable to approve its being raised.

EVICCTIONS AND PAUPERISM (SCOTLAND).

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the case that correspondence has taken place between the Secretary for Scotland and the Sheriff of Caithness as to the relation between evictions and pauperism, and between the Secretary for Scotland or the Sheriff of Caithness and various Inspectors of Poor or Parochial Boards on the same subject; and, whether copies of the Correspondence will be laid upon the Table?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I have ascertained, on further inquiry, since my reply to the Question of the hon. Member some days ago, that at the end of March a letter was received by the Secretary for Scotland from a Mr. Waters, in Caithness, which was transmitted to the Sheriff of the county, with a request to report on it to the Secretary for Scotland. In making inquiry to enable him to furnish this Report, the Sheriff has, I understand, communicated with certain Inspectors of Poor. No Report has yet been received; and I cannot give any undertaking as to the publication of the Correspondence until it has been sent.

POOR RELIEF (SCOTLAND)—POOR LAW ACT, 1845.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether, since the passing of "The Poor Law Act, 1845," about £964,000 has been collected by the Kirk Session, but only about £378,000 applied to the relief of the poor, over £500,000 having been applied to other purposes; whether, during the year 1886-7, £38,746 was collected, and only £8,484 expended for the relief of the poor; have the Kirk Sessions reported to the Board of Supervision; and, whether the Government intend to take any measures to insure that the whole of the collections should be applied to the relief of the poor as prescribed by that Act?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities), in reply, said, he had not the information to enable him to answer the Question at present, and he must ask the hon. Member to put it down again.

SUGAR BOUNTIES—DECISION OF THE CONFERENCE.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he is in a position to give any information as to the decision arrived at by the Sugar Bounties Conference; whether an opportunity for discussion will be afforded to Parliament before definite action is taken; what is the total estimated amount of the bounty on foreign sugar imported into this country; and, whether it is proposed to impose countervailing duties for the protection of sugar coming from British Colonies?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I am not in a position to give any further information as to the progress of the negotiations concerning the abolition of sugar bounties, which are still the subject of diplomatic correspondence. With regard to the second Question, if legislation should be necessary ample time will be given for considering and discussing the Convention before such legislation is introduced. As to the amount of bounty on sugar imported into this country there is a great difference of opinion on that point, the bounties mainly arising from the payment of drawback on sugar which has paid no duty. The figures could not accurately be stated without making a special Report on the subject. It would not be expedient to make such a Report now, as it necessarily involves questions still under the consideration of the Powers. The understanding arrived at by the Powers at the last meeting of the Conference prevents my making any statement, in reply to the fourth Question, from which any inference can be drawn.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—ABANDONMENT OF THE LICENSING CLAUSES.

MR. ERNEST SPENCER (West Bromwich) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the abandonment of the Licensing Clauses of the Local Government Bill includes Clause 19, which gives powers to County Councils to increase licences 20 per cent?

THE PRESIDENT (MR. RITONIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Yes; it is proposed to withdraw Clause 19 from the Bill.

CHELSEA HOSPITAL—GEORGE WILLIAMS, A PENSIONER.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been directed to the report in The Times newspaper of April 21 last of the case "Ex parte George Williams," in which application was made for a mandamus to the Governor and Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital to issue their warrant for payment to the applicant of certain arrears of pension; whether the Court, as therein stated, intimated their opinion that the applicant should get the flat of the Attorney General for a Petition of Right; and, whether such a proceeding could be adopted without cost?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I have referred to the report of the case mentioned by the hon. Member in The Times newspaper of April 21 last. As I understand, the Court did not express any opinion; but pointed out that the remedy of the applicant, if any, was by Petition of Right. It is the flat of Her Majesty, and not that of the Attorney General, that is required in these cases. No fee is payable on the Petition to Her Majesty, to the Home Office, or to the Attorney General. If a Petition of Right will lie in Williams' case, he should present a Petition in the form prescribed by 23 and 24 Vict. c 34. He can present such Petition himself, or through a solicitor.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL—APPROPRIATION OF FUNDS.

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown has been taken as to the legality of the appropriation of some of the funds of Greenwich Hospital, which, by the Charter of the Hospital, should be devoted to charitable purposes, to the payment of men of the Seamen Pensioners' Reserve Force, who are virtually a portion of the Effective Forces of the Crown; and, whether, if the question has not been submitted to the Law Officers, it will be?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Question as to the legality of appropriating Greenwich Hospital Funds to the payment of Seamen Pensioner Reserve has not been referred by the Admiralty to the Law Officers of the Crown, and there is no present intention of doing so. The Admiralty, as Trustees, are empowered under Act of Parliament (Greenwich Hospital Act, 1865) to grant such pensions as they may deem fit; but such pensions must be legalized by an Order in Council, and such an Order has been obtained for the grant of these particular pensions, and therefore all legal formalities have been met.

RULES AND ORDERS OF THIS HOUSE— DIVISIONS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway N.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the House could have an opportunity of considering whether it would be advisable to unlock the Library and exit doors of the Main Lobby immediately after the door of the House being unlocked during a Division, power to be reserved to Mr. Speaker to keep these doors locked for any special Division; in case of a disagreement between the Tellers, Mr. Speaker to decide without a second Division which telling should be accepted by the House as correct, using, if he considered it advisable, the Division Lists to decide the difference?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Government are not aware that the present manner of taking Divisions in this House has worked unsatisfactorily; and until the Government are assured that there is among the Members of this House a general desire for some change of the existing arrangements, they are not prepared to take the steps indicated by the hon. and gallant Member, which I am inclined to think might occasion considerable inconvenience to hon. Members.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1867—IMPRISONMENT OF MR. DILLON, M.P.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government will lay on the Table of the House a copy of the record and depositions in the Court of First Instance and on appeal in the case of Mr. John Dillon, a Member of this House, sentenced on the 29th ultimo, at Dundalk, to an imprisonment of six months? I should be obliged if the right hon. Gentleman could answer me now; but if not, of course, I shall put the Question on the Paper in the ordinary way.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not object to put it down on the Paper, as it is a matter of some importance, and requires consideration; and I would remind him that the course he asks the Government to pursue is not usual. I do not say that it is wholly without precedent. There are certain precedents for it, but they are very few and far between. The right hon. Gentleman is sensible that, although such a course may be justifiable in some cases, it ought not to be generally followed; and I shall be glad if he will give the special reasons why it should be done in this case; because, as far as I understand the matter, the points of law and the facts which were raised at this trial were of a very simple character.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I fear that if I gave the special reasons now, it would be your duty, Mr. Speaker, to check me, so that I am afraid I cannot do so.

MR. PIOTON (Leicester): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware of any other case in which a prisoner, condemned to six months' imprisonment, received, before leaving the dock, an address, signed by 150 Members of this House?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I should like to ask the Chief Secretary a Question in reference to an answer which he gave me yesterday afternoon. The right hon. Gentleman then told me—these are his words—

"The Court of Exchequer in Dublin had said that there clearly was evidence of conspiracy at Common Law. I see by the reports in the papers to-day that the Court said there might be evidence, if it were furnished, of conspiracy at Common Law."

I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether his account last night, or the account which appears in the papers of to-day, is correct?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I answered the right hon. Gentleman last night from such telegraphic information as was at my disposal. I was not aware, when the right hon. Gentleman put the Question just now, that there was any discrepancy between the information which I gave him last night and the reports in the papers of to-day. I will, however, inquire into the matter, and give the right hon. Gentleman an authoritative statement with regard to it to-morrow.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): A day or two ago I asked the Chief Secretary whether there was, or whether there would be, any other evidence of the Killeagh trial besides that which appeared in the reports in the public papers of that trial; and, after referring to the Irish Law Officers, he told me that he should be prepared to supplement the evidence which had appeared in the newspapers on that subject. I wish now to ask him whether he will supplement the evidence, as he said he would do?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I have not the slightest objection, if the right hon. Gentleman will take the usual course of placing his Question upon the Paper, to give him all the information in my power on the subject.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Might I ask if the right hon. Gentleman would have any objection to laying on the Table also the Judgment of the Judges?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is a matter as to which, of course, I will make inquiry.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary, whether he will be able to say to-morrow how many prisoners are now undergoing terms of imprisonment in Ireland for taking part in a criminal conspiracy to compel or induce others not to do what the law gives them a right to do; how many of these prisoners there are; and, whether, as in the case of the Milltown Malbay prisoners who got six months for refusing to sell provisions, the Government will consider the sentences in the light of a recent judicial decision?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know whether I can obtain the information which the hon. and learned Member desires by to-morrow; but I think that it is quite possible—at all events, I will do my best—to obtain it. But with regard to the action which the Government may take with regard to prisoners, I would point out that if they, or their legal advisers, think that they are wrongly sentenced, they have their remedy, and they are wrong if they have not appealed. There is no one more competent to know that that is the case than the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, that the sentences to which he referred had been confirmed on appeal.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR. KELLY, COUNTY COURT JUDGE OF CLARE.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.) wished to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a Question, of which he had given him private Notice. Had the right hon. Gentleman's attention been directed to reports in some of the morning papers of a discussion which occurred at the Ennis Quarter Sessions yesterday, when Mr. Kelly, the County Court Judge of Clare, advised and instructed Colonel Turner, Resident Magistrate, as to the course he should pursue with reference to political meetings; and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he considered the course taken by Mr. Kelly—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman will give Notice of the Question.

MR. JORDAN: I gave the right hon. Gentleman private Notice to-day.

MR. SPEAKER: That is not sufficient for a Question of that kind. It depends upon the length of the Notice.

MR. JORDAN said, he had given the earliest possible Notice that day.

MR. SPEAKER: Order!

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CUSTOMS (WINE DUTY) BILL.

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Jackson.)

[BILL 293.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.) said, that the existing system of Wine Duties was introduced nearly 30 years ago, after the total abolition of ad valorem duties on all imports, and wine of a low value was taxed at the same amount as wine of a high value. The system of imposing ad valorem duties not only in regard to wine, but in reference to many other articles upon which duties were levied, had fallen into utter disrepute, and he could not help thinking that it was not worth while to revert back to that system, and disturb the Wine Duties for the small amount of revenue which would be obtained. The change would result in a great interference with trade, and would give rise to much heartburning and dissatisfaction. It was, therefore, a matter of great regret that Parliament should be asked to return, even as to one article, to a system which had been unanimously got rid of a good many years ago. He regretted that he was not present when the debate in Committee took place, or he should have tried then to give practical effect to what he felt it his duty to say now; but the discussion was not brought on until half-past 12 o'clock, and he had been told that it would not be taken after midnight. He was sorry that this change had been proposed by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had always been regarded as a sound financier, especially on questions of trade and revenue.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,410,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Supply and Repair of Warlike and other Stores, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889."

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, he had placed a Motion on the Paper to reduce the Vote by the sum of £1,000 in respect of Inspection and Proof of Stores, and the best authority which he had for the action which he was taking in the matter was the very able Report which had been presented by the Judge Advocate General himself. Another reason for bringing forward the matter was that amidst the glut of Commissions inquiring into every possible subject, the value of the information obtained was not even noticed by Ministers themselves. They had evidence of that the other day, when Lord Wolseley gave evidence before a Commission presided over by Sir James Stephen on the subject of the defences of the country, and yet the evidence given by Lord Wolseley did not appear to have been seen by the Prime Minister himself. A further reason was that while the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General brought forward some astounding facts, he had sugared them over so carefully with excuses and apologies for the misdemeanance that he (Mr. Hanbury) hoped even the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) would not object to his pressing the subject upon his notice. Seeing that the Judge Advocate General found that acts of the gravest character committed by the officials in the Store Department at Woolwich were done from the purest motives, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be glad if he were to press upon him that the public also had some little interest in the matter. It was well known that even the high officials carefully abstained from granting the stores which the public required, and yet had cleverly succeeded in obtaining rewards and pensions for themselves. What was it that the Judge Advocate General was obliged to report? He reported that the ordinary accoutrements, especially equipments for war and the saddlery supplied to the Army, were literally in a rotten state; go wherever they might in the great purchasing Department they would find the same grave scandals going on, and the officials prepared to make the same stale excuses. He would read to the House the character of some of the bad stores on which the Judge Advocate General reported. There were bad traces, bad saddle flaps, bad wallets, bad valises, bad saddlery of all kinds, and leather laces for sea service. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the leather was bad, and the stitching a great deal worse, unwaxed thread having been used, or, being waxed, the thread was bad. It must be recollected that these were stores which meant not only loss of money, but, if war were to happen, a much greater disaster—namely, loss of life in the Army and Navy. In addition to the stores he had mentioned there were many others, such as pack-saddles, most of which had straw in the place of hair, and what hair there was in them was bad. Indeed, it was admitted that the hair in the pack-saddles was only worth half the price of the hair they ought to contain. These things were passed into Woolwich Store Department on an enormous scale. He was told there were 18,000 of these pack-saddles at one time or another; and of Cavalry saddles of one pattern—that of 1884—there were over 3,500. What was found worse than that was the fact that it was clearly brought out in the Report of the Judge Advocate General that the Government standard itself was very low for these things, and that they did not require for the Public Service the good article they ought to get. Not only was the supply bad, but the samples were bad also, because, bad as the samples were, the articles passed into Woolwich were not adequate to fulfil the low requirements specified. He had spoken hitherto of manufactured articles; but he would turn now to unmanufactured articles. Surely it was easy enough for the Government to procure unmanufactured articles of good quality. Nevertheless, the Judge Advocate General reported in regard to the hides passed into Woolwich—

“In the beginning of 1886, 11 specimens were selected. Having looked at a great many of the hides in the stores, I think the 11 taken were a fair sample, if not of the whole delivery, of a very large portion of it.”

That was of all he had seen. What was the report of the Government as to the condition of those hides? In fact, the price of glucose had gone up lately in consequence of the quantity put into the Government stores. The best specimen showed 7·20 per cent of glucose, while eight showed over 20 per cent, and the two worst 25·20 per cent. The question arose—“How did such things find their way into the Government stores at all?” He was not dealing with a small amount of stores, but with stores passed in in large numbers, the badness of which in a case of war would involve a serious loss of life of our troops. But he would go further than that. He wanted to place the matter on the fairest possible ground, and, therefore, he would take the Government's own pet firm—the best firm on the list—and show how that firm did the work. He would take, too, not only the best firm dealing with the War Office, but the firm which dealt largely with other Departments of the Government—namely, Ross and Company, of Bermondsey. These were the words of the Judge Advocate General—

“They are now by far the largest contractors for supplying accoutrements to the Government. During the five years ending March, 1887, they have had 56 contracts and supplied 1,687,274 articles. The firm of Messrs. Ross get by far the largest share of business from the Government—in fact, three times more than any other firm.”

This was only in regard to some portion of the contracts sent in, and referred simply to accoutrements. Messrs. Ross sent in an enormous amount of saddlery and other articles, and the contracts obtained by other firms were largely supplied by Messrs. Ross. The next largest contractors were the firm of Messrs Pulman, and it was in evidence that a large portion of the articles sent in by Messrs. Pulman were really supplied by Messrs. Ross. These two firms together supplied the Government at Woolwich with two-thirds of the whole of their requirements, and they did work not only for the War Office, but for the Post Office, the Colonies, and India. In regard to the Admiralty, a representative of Messrs. Ross was asked—

“Are they more particular at the Admiralty than they are here? No; the inspection is just the same.—They do not reject more there? No; the inspection is just about the same.”

They had the fact that this large firm sent in to Woolwich a large quantity of goods for the Public Service; and yet, in regard to many of those goods, they were furnished by middlemen, notwithstanding that there was a distinct rule at the War Office that the articles supplied ought to be only bought from the manufacturers, and not from the middlemen. He could not see why that rule had not been observed in this case, and he thought the facts he had mentioned proved that there was no great reason why the Government should go out of their way to select middlemen. But, while they were middlemen in regard to all manufactured articles, they were also sweaters, and sweaters of the very worst kind. There had been startling evidence recently given before a Committee in “another place.” Evidence had been given in regard to the accoutrements supplied to the Army by three firms, and every one of the witnesses singled out Ross and Co. as the very worst sweaters in Bermondsey.

Mr. Hanbury

John Thomas Morris, Army smith, said—

“The accoutrement business had come under his notice for the last 15 years. As secretary of the Saddlery Trade Society, he had seen the miserable results of the lowering of wages. He referred particularly to Ross and Co., of Grange Road, Bermondsey. The net result was bad work for the Government, hard work for the workers, and riches for the sweaters.”

John Correy, harness-maker, stated that the practice was for Government contractors to get estimates from sub-contractors, and then give out the work to those who made the lowest tender. Ross and Co. began to employ girls in their place, to whom they paid less than the sweaters received. Arnold Whight pointed out that Bermondsey, the headquarters of Messrs. Ross, the hours were from 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. He also declared that Messrs. Ross were the worst sweaters he was acquainted with. Other sweaters paid men 3s. 3d. for blocking and sewing 12 cartridge pouches for the Navy. It took three and a-half hours to make one. Ross had them made in his workshops for 1s. 9d. a dozen by women. The thread was inferior, because the workpeople had to buy it. The Government, as a rule, ought to be very careful how they gave out these contracts, and should make them only with the men who did the work. The Director of Contracts knew very well what he was doing, and that Government official himself said in his evidence—

“The specifications describe the very best sort of leather, and I think there is no doubt whatever that such a kind could not be purchased for the prices the Government pay.”

It came out in the evidence of Mr. Southey that at the time of the Crimean War the best kind of leather was supplied to the Government. Now, the Ordnance Department, in their specifications, describe the very best class of leather, but take it at a price at which no manufacturer could possibly sell it at a profit. Even sweaters would not oblige the Government out of pure patriotism.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) said, he understood the hon. Member intended to confine his remarks to the hides.

MR. HANBURY said, he was referring to the hides. The Government official called it leather, whether it was hides or not; but even the sweaters did not send articles in at a low price in order to oblige the Government. Nor were they passed in by the Government viewers out of the highest and purest motive. All this was a question, as the Judge Advocate General said, not of motives, but of facts. The best course was to judge by the facts, and when the facts were ascertained, to see whether the motives were of the true and high character which the Judge Advocate General maintained they were. How was it possible for goods such as these to be passed in wholesale from such a firm as this? He would show how some of the firms were treated by the Director of Contracts. One of the witnesses said they got special orders; whenever anything was wanted in a hurry, they went to Ross's. That meant that for anything that could not be carefully inspected, they were to go to Ross and Company. Of course competition was sometimes necessary. The job would be far too great if these things were always got in a hurry. But, then, Ross and Company were placed upon a limited list of firms. He protested against such an arrangement, and he hoped that in future the House would insist that there should be no such thing. But Ross and Company were something more than put upon a favoured and limited list of contractors. They had special knowledge; and in dealing with a Government Department, knowledge was power. They knew the fashion in which the Government work was conducted. They were acquainted with some of the peculiarities in the work, and they were well aware of the strength and unbusiness-like fashion in which the Government did this work. Moreover, they were acquainted with their own special manner of passing into the Government Establishments their own bad articles. He would give an instance to show some of the special knowledge they had. As old contractors, they were acquainted with the fact that the specifications, according to which articles were ordered, the sale pattern, and the sample according to which they were to be tested, were very different things in these wonderful Government Establishments. They also knew the fact, which outsiders did not know, that though these specifications were excellent, they were in many cases obsolete; they were never taken notice of, and never came before the men who had to pass in and test the articles. He would take a case—the case of hides, which was quoted by the Judge Advocate General himself—which was the question the Secretary of State for War was anxious he should lay stress upon. In the case of hides the Judge Advocate General said:—

“Prime, sound, English-dressed leather, oak bark tannage, clean, level, of good colour, well shaven, dressed, and in a perfectly dry state.”

That was the kind of thing we had to pay for, or rather ought to pay for; but what, as a matter of fact, was the thing passed in at the Government Establishments? Two experts pronounced a sealed pattern as “shocking and could not be worse; wretched, and as bad as anything could be.” What did the Judge Advocate General himself say in regard to a particular sample? He said—

“It had been in use since 1872, and had evidently received rough handling. There were a good many of what were called butcher’s cuts in it, and also warble holes—that was holes made by grubs in the cattle.”

That was the kind of article sent in as saddlery to the Government Establishments and tested by viewers. There was a sealed pattern kept by the Government; but he was told that, as a matter of fact, in many cases, where Ross and Company passed in their goods, the sealed pattern had not been taken at all, but that the sample was taken from the list supplied by the contractors themselves. Even that was not enough, and outsiders were altogether unable to know that the rules were being broken. There was one thing upon which the Judge Advocate General had reported strongly. In some instances the Government viewer had to plod wearily through every single article. It was not sufficient to examine one, and if it was bad to decline to take the rest; but if the viewer found that the first 20 were bad, he had still to go through the whole, before he would be justified in rejecting a single one. In the case of hides, there was a rule that every one of them should weigh from 22 lbs. to 23 lbs., that was to be the average weight; but, as a matter of fact, the hides were weighed in a lump, with the result that some of them only weighed one-half what they ought to have weighed. What did the test of weight mean? It meant that their quality and condition should be properly ascertained; but one quarter of them had the weight made up to a large extent of glucose. The only test of that glucose in the Government Establishment was its weight. There was no chemical or scientific test whatever at the contractor’s own works, nor was there any scientific test at the Store Department of the Government. The Government officials were not even allowed to put a practical test to the hides when delivered, in order to ascertain the quantity of glucose, although some were as full of glucose as they could well be, as was plainly observable from the sweet smell of the sugar. When tasted, some of these hides were as sweet as sugar; but the officials of the Ordnance Department maintained that they should not be so tested, and the hides were continued to be tested by weight, instead of any more scientific test. He thought that showed pretty well the system under which these articles were passed in. He would now show the way in which the system was administered. Everything depended upon whom the people were who tested and viewed the articles whenever the contractors endeavoured to pass them in. The Inspector who was responsible for these things was a man who had been brought from the office of the contractors themselves. He had been in the employment of the contractors ever since he was a boy, his father had been in the same employment for 30 years, and he had a brother-in-law also connected with the firm. And that was the man brought in as Head of the Department to inspect the goods passed in by Ross and Co. Not content in making him Inspector of the articles sent in by Ross and Co., contrary to all precedent he had a double appointment given to him, and was made Inspector of Saddlery, so that he had to inspect the saddlery sent in by the same firm of which he had been so long a servant. It might be thought that this man had been brought in to inspect the contractor’s work on account of great knowledge and technical skill in that direction; but, on the contrary, as a matter of fact, the man, to begin with, was of no education at all. The Directors of Contracts, Mr. Nepean, said he thought that this man, Mr. Spice, was not sufficiently educated for the appointment. Then, possibly, he was a man of technical knowledge and had a large acquaintance with the kind of articles he had to inspect. As a matter of fact, the Judge Advocate General himself had an opportunity of speaking of Mr. Spice's merits, and Spice himself had carefully passed over and had refused to appoint as viewers, two men who were responsible for bringing these scandals to light. He had passed them over, on the ground that they were not fit for the work, and had made them deputy viewers. But the Judge Advocate General said that the opinion of the men he had refused to appoint was worth a great deal more than the opinion of the Inspector himself. They were told that it was necessary to go for an Inspector to Messrs. Ross, because buff articles were brought in under the head of accoutrements, and, therefore, it was necessary to go to one of the five firms which supplied buff articles, in order to get a knowledge of buff. But, unfortunately for that contention, while Spice was at Messrs. Ross's, he had nothing to do with buff at all, but had only been foreman of the men who cut out black leather—a totally different thing in every possible respect. Then, how came such a man as this to be appointed? because he thought it was a matter the Secretary of State ought to follow up. It was a matter of importance to ascertain who was responsible in a Government Establishment for appointing a man to test articles who came from the contractors who supplied the articles, and who was proved not to have the special knowledge that was absolutely necessary for the discharge of that duty. It was highly desirable that they should trace home the responsibility to the man who had appointed him. The Judge Advocate General in his Report, too, carefully screened the head man of all, the Director of Contracts. The Director said that he did not recommend this man. Now, he (Mr. Hanbury) did not wish to put his own gloss upon the matter, but he would read two answers which had been given in the evidence. It would appear that, when the appointment was decided upon, there were 47 or 48 applicants. This was Question 4,207—

“Forty-seven or 48 is what has been stated in evidence; you say 48?—About that number.

4,208. What happened next?—The replies to the advertisement were then sent by me to the War Office and were passed by the Director of Artillery and Stores to Mr. Nepean, the Director of Contracts. From the names submitted, he selected five, Spice being one; but he did not recommend Spice; he thought that he was not sufficiently educated for the appointment. The five names were then sent to me for my report, and I have brought here with me a little memorandum, which, perhaps, I might refer to, showing why these different people were rejected. (The witness referred to the memorandum.) The five names which were selected and sent to me were Spice, Thompson, Mayne, First Class Staff Sergeant Hawkins, Army Service Corps, and R. May. Then Mr. Nepean reported that, failing the four latter names, he saw no alternative but to fall back upon Spice, but he did not altogether concur in the appointment. Then Thompson we knew nothing about at all.”

Now, Mr. Nepean was Director of Contracts, and he wanted to know why on earth the Director of Contracts, whose duty was simply to give out contracts, should interfere, either directly or indirectly, in the appointment of an Inspector, whose duty it was to ascertain whether the articles were good? The man who gave out the contracts ought to score the discharge of his duties there, and should have nothing more to do with the matter. Certainly, it was improper that he should interfere in the appointment of a man in the position which Mr. Spice held, and especially that he should appoint a man who had long been in the employment of the firm which supplied the contracts. This was how the appointment was made. From the 48 names, Mr. Nepean selected five; one of them was Mr. May, who was working at Messrs. Ross at that moment; another man was Mr. Mayne, in the employment of Almond, who had the Indian contract; the third was a man named Thompson, of whom Mr. Nepean said he knew nothing whatever; the fourth was Hawkins, of whom the Judge Advocate General had very unsatisfactorily spoken. Spice was the fifth. Having selected these five, the Director of Contracts said that he had no other choice than to fall back upon Spice, because none of the rest were good for anything. Therefore, he reluctantly felt bound to appoint Spice, although he did come from the contractors who supplied the articles. That was how the matter was worked. It was not sufficient, however, to have an Inspector who came from Messrs. Ross. It was also necessary that a great number of viewers who worked under him should also come from the same firm of contractors. No sooner had Spice received the double appointment of Inspector of Contracts and Inspector of Saddlery, than he set about to get active viewers brought in from the firm of Ross and Co. The first man of those whom he appointed as viewer was a man named Hawkins, who had been dismissed from Government employment some years before for having, while in their employment, taken sub-contracts with a man named Curtis from Ross and Co., and carefully arranged that his own goods should be passed into the Government Departments. It was upon that ground that he was dismissed, and the Judge Advocate General mentioned the extraordinary inability of Hawkins to tell the truth, and declared that his evidence was extremely unsatisfactory. Hawkins was described by a quartermaster as a man whom he would not trust a snap of the fingers. Now, Sergeant Hawkins was the only man dismissed by the Government in consequence of these scandals; and he was told, although it was hardly credible, that the man had appealed to the Secretary of State, who had sent him back again. Was that the fact?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he was not prepared to interrupt the hon. Gentleman until he rose to reply to the whole of his speech.

MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.) asked, would the hon. Member for Preston inform the House when the first appointment of Spice had been made?

MR. HANBURY said, he had been in the employment of the Government for some years, commencing about 1880. In addition to Hawkins, there was a man working under Messrs. Ross as a sub-director and assistant to the Commissary General, Colonel Rawnsley, who had himself described this man as a sweater of the very lowest type. In addition, there was a man named Biden, whose father was working at Messrs. Ross's at the time of his appointment, and who himself came from the same firm. Not content with the appointment of these men as viewers, other persons were brought in to act as temporary viewers—such as Lawson, Pipe, and Woodbridge, one of whom was a nephew of Spice, and knew nothing of the work he had to inspect. Even that was not enough. It was not sufficient to have these men passing in the Government goods, but the rule which was observed in all other Government Establishments in order to provide a check was broken in this instance. In other Government Establishments the viewer was required to put his mark upon the goods which he passed, so that if bad things were passed in there would be some responsibility, and it would be known who passed them in. But in this blissful Establishment there was nothing of that kind; no viewer was required to put a mark upon the goods, and the result was that bad things were passed in, and there was no responsibility whatever. But that was not all. It was not sufficient even to do business in that way, and he should have to go a little further than that. As a rule, he was told that manufactured articles, such as collars, should be sent in half-made, so that the authorities should be able to see whether they were stuffed with straw or hair, and in that way ascertain whether the Government got the things for which they paid their money. That rule was invariably broken in this Establishment. One of the witnesses named Chase said that the specification required the contractor to submit collars in a half-finished state, without hair, facings, and cream-coloured duck lining. These were not submitted, because women took them away to sew the cream drill linings on, and returned them to be stuffed. Things were therefore passed in without any opportunity being afforded to judge of anything except the outside, and in that way collars stuffed with straw instead of hair were sent in. The ingenuity manifested by the Government contractor and the officials working together was positively marvellous. In many instances, the viewers actually went to the contractor's own yards in order to pass the things in. Of the 3,500 saddles of the pattern of 1884, 1,000 were passed at Ross's own works. One of the witnesses was asked to pass them, and his reply was that Mr. Plunkett went down to pass them; but Mr. Plunkett was not an Inspector of Leather at the time. Captain Plunkett had been Inspector of Saddlery, but had been superseded because he was not up to the work, and for other reasons. But when it became necessary to pass 100 of these 3,500 new saddles, Captain Plunkett was found good enough to be called back and sent to the contractor's own works, and Captain Plunkett, a superseded official, actually passed them in. But the story did not end there. It was not sufficient to have the contractor's own men in the Establishment, but it was necessary to have a contractor himself present in the Department. One of the witnesses, Dunn, said that Mr. Tomlin, the principal partner in the firm of Messrs. Ross and Company, was continually there. Chase, another witness, was asked whether Spice sent for him to show what was rejected, and his reply was—“Very likely; he has been in three or four times a-week, and up in Spice's office; we generally used to leave him in the office with him.”

The same witness was asked—“Used he to watch you viewing?—He used to come round the shop.

When things were being viewed?—Yes.

His own articles?—Yes.

Did you condemn them a third time?—Yes. I condemned them till I did not see any more of them; we had heaps of them each side of us. Mr. Tomlin came to Embledon's board, and he said: ‘If you go on in this way you will ruin us.’

That is to say, if you went on rejecting the bed straps?—Yes.

Who did he say that to?—He said it for all of us to hear.

Did you hear it?—Yes; I could not be off hearing it.”

So much for the relations between the contractors and the Government officials. The Judge Advocate General very innocently said there could have been no jobbery possible, because when he came to look at the Return he found that Messrs. Ross had almost as many articles rejected by the viewers as other contractors. Now, that statement required a little examination, and he thought it would be found that it told in a different direction. In the first place, it was apparent, even to the meanest intelligence, that it was necessary to have a fair proportion of goods rejected, or else even the authorities in the Government Establishment might get suspicious. In addition to this note, he might mention that Ross and Company were not the only firm who had viewers from their own works inside the Government Establishments passing in their own goods. At the moment the Judge Advocate General was holding his inquiry down at Woolwich, Colonel Barrington said that Messrs. Masons had been written to, by the permission of the Secretary for War, for a viewer, and they had sent a viewer from their own establishment. This was the firm who had supplied 400 of the very worst Indian pack-saddles. When the Judge Advocate General said that the rejections took place in almost equal quantities, whether they came from Ross and Co. or any other firm, he forgot to mention that they were primary rejections only. It by no means followed that goods rejected the first time were not again sent in and passed into the Government Establishments within a very few days of their rejection. If there was one thing to be gathered from the Report it was that the inspection was so carefully arranged that the primary rejections in hardly any case became final rejections. What happened? How was it possible to prevent these articles from coming in again? The rule of the Establishment was to mark them with chalk. He should have considered it better to have marked them with something more durable than chalk, and something that was not so liable to be so easily rubbed off. Question 991 was this—

“Mr. Spice used to come round with Mr. Tomlin; he used to come down the shop and look at us. This note (invoice) of bed straps, for instance, he came down and actually told us not to mark them—it would be such a job to get the chalk mark out.

Who told you that?—Mr. Tomlin, one of the partners at Ross's.

Do you mean that he comes to the shop?—He has come down to the board where we are sitting.

What did he say to you?—He told us not to chalk them too much, it would be such a job to get the chalk marks out.

Did he mean you not to mark things that had been rejected too much, so that the chalk marks would not come out?—Yes.

Mr. Tomlin came and requested you not to put too much chalk on?—Yes.

What did you understand by that?—Because they were apt to come in again; these notes have been in over and over again with our own chalk marks on these bed straps. Even if rejected they were done up in the Department itself at the Government cost.

Are there any other matters that you would like to draw my attention to?—There is one thing which I wish to mention, to show that there is a little favouritism with regard to Ross's firm. On three Saturday afternoons we were put on overtime.

What year are you speaking of?—1885.

What month?—About March. On three Saturday afternoons we were altering a lot of pouches; we were doing this for Ross's firm; they had been passed in by somebody else before we went there.

Let me understand; they had been passed in by somebody else, you say?—Yes.

You were altering them in the Government collar-maker's shop?—In the inspection branch.

Do they work in the inspection branch?—Yes, we did anything we were told to do; we were sent over there to assist; we did not know whether it was our duty or not.

Is it the rule that anybody should be there to alter things that had been sent in?—No.

But it is done?—Yes. There is a class of men picked out for those jobs.

Who picks them out?—I suppose the Inspector.

Mr. Spice?—Mr. Spice; he was in charge at the time. Whether he has ever asked them to do it, or whether they do it themselves, I cannot say.

Things come in which are not up to sample, or would not be passed, and which would require some alteration, and a man in the Government employ is there to alter them?—He is not there to alter them; but he does alter them.

Can you tell me the name of any people who do that?—I have seen Woodbridge do that.

Any other?—No. I have done a few myself when I have been told."

But even that was not sufficient to insure that the primary rejections were ultimately passed in. If articles were rejected by one viewer, they were carefully passed over to someone who came from Messrs. Ross's firm, or who had got a father or a brother or some connection there. Here was some evidence in regard to frogs—

"Question 710. Then the next is 'Frogs, sword bayonet;' the number at the side is 7,690 (No. 1 book) 'Ross' (at the top) '125 defective, bad work and material'?—Yes; those were frogs. I called Spice's attention to it, and he told us to reject them. We did so, and when we went to breakfast he had them given to Biden; he is an ordinary viewer; they were given to him, and he passed them.

Are those the 125?—Yes.

Those 125 you rejected?—Yes.

Did you do it by yourself?—No; Chase was with me.

Did Chase agree with you?—Yes.

That they should be rejected?—Yes.

Why did you reject them?—Because they were badly stitched. I told Spice that it was some youngster that was half-time at school had done the work, that no man could have done it.

Colonel BARRINGTON: These were frogs?—Yes.

The JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL: You called Spice's attention to that?—Yes.

Did he agree with you?—He told us to condemn them, and when he went out to breakfast he gave them to Biden, and Biden passed them.

You have no doubt about it?—Not a bit. Chase will say the same."

That was how the inspection was managed. But there was another way also in which it was done. Sometimes goods were sent in and rejected, and subsequently taken in at reduced price. He maintained that that ought not to be the case. If they were not good enough to come up to the Government standard, which was bad enough in itself, do not let them have these shoddy things taken in at reduced prices. He was told that not long ago at Pimlico a number of helmets were taken in at reduced prices because there was a quantity of brown paper in them. If they were not passed, they were sent to the contractor to be re-dressed. What did that mean? It simply meant that part of the glucose was taken out, they were never re-weighed, and consequently the full price was paid for that which was half the weight it ought to be. If it were not found safe to send in things within a short time, they were put by for a year or two, and sent in under a new contract. That might sound incredible; but it was, nevertheless, the fact. In Question 415 the Judge Advocate General asked—

"Was anything else passed which you say ought not to have been passed?—Yes; a lot of things. For instance, there were 500 pouches sent in.

Can we identify those pouches?—It would be very hard to do so.

Colonel MILLS: In what year were they sent in?—January, 1886, I think. I was told that the contract was given out on the 16th of January, and the things were sent in about a fortnight after; they were very bad when sent in; but they had been laid by in the store a couple of years; in fact, they were old rejections just done up a bit, and sent in again. Biden was senior to me, and I drew his attention to them; I said they were not fit to be passed in, and he drew Spice's attention to them, and he said, 'There is an order from the War Office that they are to be inspected.'"

The way in which these facts became known was, that in a subsequent year, when a fresh contract was being made, these things were sent in bearing the mark of 1884, and showing that they had been sent in at that time. This was not the mere evidence of one or two viewers, or discontented men at Woolwich, but it was borne out literally, and year after year, by the Assistant Commissary General (Colonel Rawnsley), who complained of the way in which rejected goods were sent in. In question 2,825, he was asked by the Judge Advocate General—

"I understand you wish to add something to what you have said before?—I wanted to bring to your notice a matter we have to contend with sometimes in the inspection branch, and I think it is pertinent to the subject of this inquiry. We find at times that when articles have been rejected they are sent in over again. They are sent in under two different circumstances: one is when they are rejected for certain faults which can be remedied; the other is when they are rejected for faults which cannot be remedied. I divide them into two classes. I take, first, rejections for faults which can be remedied. We find sometimes we get those articles sent in over again without any attempt being made to rectify them; that is bad enough; but we find what is worse than that, that sometimes when we reject articles for faults which cannot be remedied we get those articles in over again. We have known that that has actually taken place by private marks which have been placed upon those which we have rejected, because we have had a suspicion that they might perhaps come in to us again; and I think you will see that it places the inspection branch and all the inspecting staff in a most invidious position, because if by any oversight or anything unforeseen, any one of those articles should be passed, an unscrupulous contractor might at once say that the inspection branch was most inconsistent, that we accepted one day what we rejected a week or two before; and not only that, but the whole staff have to waste their time going over all those articles again, which, in fact, have already been rejected. I submit with all respect that it is a question for the consideration of the authorities which have to deal with these matters, whether some drastic measures should not be adopted to put a stop to this on the part of contractors by the infliction of some punishment which might be decided upon by the authorities who have to deal with these matters, either by removing them for a time from the list of contractors, or striking them off altogether, according to the magnitude of the offence."

He had two remarks to make upon that matter. The first was that the punishment suggested by Colonel Rawnsley would by no means satisfy him, because he held that when people sent such stores to a Government, upon which the lives of the troops, and even the safety of the country, depended, it was not enough to strike them off the list of contractors, or even to dismiss them, but a Bill ought to be brought in by the Government inflicting on them a very heavy penalty indeed. Colonel Rawnsley deserved little credit for giving this evidence before the Judge Advocate General; he ought to have given it before, and brought the whole of the facts. Why did they not have punishments of this kind inflicted? Because it was a high official of the War Office himself who was largely responsible for these things. The high official who gave out the contracts was himself the man who appointed as Inspector a person who came from the contractors themselves. Why was it that even Colonel Rawnsley was not able to prevent these articles from being sent in again? He would not put his own gloss upon the matter, but would give the evidence of Mr. Tomlin, the contractor. The witness Chase said—

"There are other things I have seen passed in. I saw Mr. Tomlin, Rose's manager, come down there and complain about the things we rejected—rifle pouches. He was allowed to take them back and rub dubbin into them to soften them. They were rejected as being hard and heavy, and he sent them in again."

What do you say to that?—That if Mr. Spice had not allowed me to do that, I should have appealed to the Director of Contracts?

On what ground?—I should have taken them away, dubbed them, sent them back again, and asked for them to be re-inspected, and I should have beaten the department.

Supposing that you send in articles at first which are not up to sample, is it not right to reject them?—Certainly.

Were not these up to sample?—They were hard. They were up to sample when they came back again.

That is not the point. Were they up to sample at first? I say that if he had not allowed me to re-deliver them, I should have appealed to the Director of Contracts."

Here they had this remarkable mention of Mr. Nepean, the Director of Contracts at the War Office, who found that was not sufficient. In order to prevent the possibility of tracing bad things from such a firm as that, when they once came into the Government Establishment, what happened? He took the case of hides, for instance. After they had been for two months in a Government Establishment, they were so badly stored that it was utterly impossible to tell the condition in which they were sent in, and, therefore, it was impossible to trace any defects home. The Judge Advocate General reported as follows:—

"In considering the case of these hides, it transpired that those in charge of them keep them in store in a way that is universally condemned by everyone acquainted with leather. Properly, hides in store should be laid flat upon one another. In the stores at Woolwich the hides are rolled up in a round form, and then stand on one end. All the expert witnesses expressed their strong disapproval of keeping hides in store in this fashion, and it is singular that, though Mr. Crutchley told us that he had complained about it lots of times to the Inspectors, it had continued the practice for 20 years."

It would, therefore, be seen pretty clearly that even if bad things were passed in, and a disturbance was made about them, it was afterwards impossible to find out whether at the time they were passed in the articles were good or bad. There the story ended; but he thought the Committee would be anxious to learn what view the War Office took in the matter. It was not ancient history, but the system was going on at Woolwich to this very day; nor was it the case of a few things having been delivered in. The Secretary for War might tell him that some of the things were sent in at the time of the last panic in 1885. Some of them might have been, but many of them were not. Take the case of the hides. They did not buy unmanufactured articles in a time of panic, but manufactured articles. Therefore that argument went for nothing. What had been going on at Woolwich with regard to these transactions, and how had the facts come out at all? It was because two men named Dunn and Moody, workmen in humble positions, could not stand by and see such scandals going on. They, therefore, disclosed them to their superiors, who had not the patriotism to bring them before the public; and how did the Government officials treat these two men who were honestly trying to do their duty towards this Government Department. He had already shown how the Director of Contracts had treated them, and he would now show how they were treated in the Department itself. What did Commissary General Moloney say to them when they went to him to complain? He told them—"It is no business of yours; I am responsible and not you." However, these two honest men persisted, and what happened? One of those Departmental Committees, of which they heard so much, and which, he was sorry to say, the Government paid more attention to than to all the independent Commissions and Committees which ever sat—a Departmental Committee was appointed to inquire into these articles, and Spice, who was one of the men against whom the complaint was made, was one of the first persons appointed to test them. The report sent to London was that the two workmen had made frivolous complaints, and they were reprimanded accordingly. When the Judge Advocate General held his inquiry, the original complaint was examined into, and the Judge Advocate General himself said, that so far from being a frivolous complaint the articles in question were disgraceful, and he was astonished that the Woolwich officials had not taken up the matter sooner, as they ought to have done. But that was not nearly all. The contractors must have their little spite against these men. The first thing they did was to send down two detectives belonging, he was told, to a Government Department itself—two men named Kendle and Stammers—who made false charges against these men—a charge of drunkenness against Dunn and embezzlement against Moody. The Judge Advocate General inquired into those charges, and found that there was not a particle of justification for them. But the contractors were not satisfied; they knew that there was another inquiry to be held, and they got their lawyers to send threatening letters to the men, threatening them with a law suit and an action for libel. He was thankful to say that the men were brave enough to face any inquiry. This was the letter that was sent to Dunn and Moody—

"4, Bloomsbury Square,

7th July, 1887.

Sir,

We have been consulted by our clients, Messrs. Ross and Co., of Grange Mills, Bermondsey, with regard to the following matter. They have been informed that you have in league with others maliciously damaged certain of their goods after they have passed official inspection, your object being to fabricate evidence that our clients have supplied inferior goods to the War Office, and that the inspector in collusion with them has improperly passed such goods. We have, therefore, to demand from you, in the course of to-morrow, a full explanation of the matter, or in default, we shall commence criminal proceedings against you for conspiracy, or such other proceedings as we may be advised.

Yours obediently,

FORD, LLOYD, BARTLETT, and MICKLEMORE."

No notice was taken of that, and up to March of the present year the same contractors went on supplying goods to the Government Department at Woolwich. But it was not only the contractors who punished the men; they were charged with having acted against official etiquette and official rules. The Judge Advocate General said in his Report that the men Dunn and Moody, who acted as viewers, were men of intelligence, who thoroughly understood their work, and that it was a grievance to them that they had men put over their heads as overseers who had no idea of the work, and who had been brought in from Messrs. Ross's. And as distinctly as any man could recommend promotion, the Judge Advocate General recommended that they should be appointed permanent viewers, because they knew their duty and had done their work well. Yet every means had been taken, and the regulations had been strained by the Woolwich Department, to prevent these men being viewers; and, in spite of the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General, they were doing exactly the same work at the same pay as when they disclosed these scandals. He did not know who was responsible for it, but he was about to speak of the shabbiest and meanest trick that was ever played by a Government Department, and he devoutly hoped that the Secretary of State in his reply would be able to repudiate all responsibility for it. Here were two men who had done their duty boldly and at great risk to themselves; one of them was called as a witness before a Committee sitting in "another place"; he gave valuable evidence as to the way in which accoutrements were supplied to the Service; on that Committee there sat a Government official, Lord Onslow; and what did he say? In this matter the noble Lord could have no official information of his own, because he was attached to the Board of Trade as Under Secretary, and he must have derived his information from other sources. Lord Onslow asked this man if he had ever been subjected to the ordeal of a court-martial and punished for having refused to obey orders and telling a lie. In the first place he (Mr. Hanbury) said it was a dirty thing to rake up that incident in the career of a man because he had been the means of bringing to light scandals which had reflected so badly on his superiors. But it did not lie in the mouth of the War Office to bring a charge of the kind against that witness. He was a man who had served in the Army 22 years; he had served his country for six years after the charge was brought against him, and not only that, but he had left the Army with as good a character as any man could have, and with a pension which he had drawn up to the present time. He had also been taken on at Woolwich because he was a good workman, and had been through the furnace. He said, even if there had been anything in that charge it would have been a shabby and dirty trick to rake it up after such a lapse of time. But there was nothing in the charge. In the first place, all that this man had been charged with was having neglected to obey the order of a certain riding master. When he was charged with neglect of duty in that respect, he said that he had never received the order—that was the charge and that was the lie alleged against him. The riding master soon after left the regiment, and that man had since undergone one month's imprisonment in one of Her Majesty's gaols. Therefore he did not think the charge was one which the Government ought to have brought forward to try to punish him for having done his duty to the public—because doing one's duty to official superiors and doing one's duty to the public was not always the same thing. How had the Government dealt with the men who were responsible for this state of things? Had they dismissed anyone? Was Mr. Spice, the head of the Inspection Department, dismissed? No, he was there at the present moment. Were the men who were his superiors, and who were responsible for the specifications and samples, and who knew all that was going on, dismissed? On the contrary; no change had taken place. Yes, one change had taken place. The veracious Sergeant Hawkins had been dismissed. But what had happened? This person had appealed to the Secretary of State for War, and had gone back to the Department in another capacity. The contractors, he was told, had been struck off the list; but contractors had a bad habit of getting their work passed in under another name, and he was told that Messrs. Ross were doing exactly the same work as before, although their name had been struck off the Government list. It was true that another punishment was to have been put upon them; the bad hides were to have been sent back. But there were only 169 in stock, and it was stated that some which were at out-stations had not been sent back, but used for fenders in the Navy. Only 169 hides were sent back, and he was told that the pack saddles, ordinary saddles, valises, wallets, and straps which the Judge Advocate General condemned as being so bad, were, with the exception of those which were gradually being supplied to the Army when wanted, at Woolwich at the present hour. But they were kept so carelessly that it was somewhat difficult to distinguish them from other stores, and he had no doubt that if a war or panic were to arise they would be served out to the troops, and that some great disaster would result. But it was not only that the men had not been dismissed; they had been actually promoted. They had seen how the humble workman was punished for doing his duty, and they now saw that those who had not done their duty were promoted. Colonel Barrington, who was responsible for the bad articles being sent in, had been promoted to a higher salary, and not only that, but two assistants had been created to help him in doing his work. Then, again, there had been other appointments. There had been complaints with regard to the Inspector of Saddlery that he did not know his work; he was told that this official being unable to judge of the quality of leather, there had been advertisements in the newspapers for a new officer to be appointed under the name of Inspector of Leather. This was the way in which the Government dealt with the scandals in the Department in question. Colonel Rawnsley and Commissary General Moloney were men who ought to have been dismissed. But their time was up, and the only notice that had been taken of them was that they had been allowed to retire on large pensions. He said that all these things constituted a very bad case. It was of no use for the Government to tell him that these things occurred one, two, or three years ago; because he had shown what had been done by the War Office recently, and what was going on at that moment. Until the Government could show that the money asked to be voted was to be well spent, and that the Department was properly organized, he said, in the interests of the Army itself, it was incumbent upon the House of Commons to insist that the Army, although small, should be well equipped, not only in respect of weapons, but of accoutrements on which very often the lives of our soldiers depended. They should see that the lives of our soldiers and the safety of the country were not imperilled either to please the Director of Contracts, the viewers, or the Commissary General, and, least of all, the contractors who sent in these shoddy articles. Instead of being rewarded, they should be punished, and as the only means the House had of punishing them was by reducing the Vote, he moved its reduction by the sum of £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item A, £90,763, Pay of Establishments and for Inspection and Proof of Stores, be reduced by the sum of £1,000."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) said, he would remind the Committee that the facts dealt with by the hon. Member (Mr. Hanbury) occurred in 1885 and 1886, and that neither he (Mr. E. Stanhope) nor the Government were in the smallest degree responsible for any one of them. How did those facts come to light at all? If the evidence was to be trusted, the facts must have reached over a considerable number of years. It was a Commission appointed by his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), and presided over by Sir James Stephen, which, in the first place, put its finger on the evils now complained of. But that Commission was appointed to inquire into warlike stores passed into the Service. The Commissioners did not think it was their duty to make any investigation into the matters now brought under the notice of the Committee, but recommended that a special and separate inquiry should take place. As soon as he saw that paragraph in the Report he came to the conclusion that there ought to be a special and separate inquiry, and, looking to the contradictory nature of the evidence going to be brought forward, he determined that something in the nature of a judicial inquiry should be instituted, and that someone should be appointed, accustomed to weigh and present conclusions founded on careful investigation of the facts on one side and the other. Accordingly, he requested the Judge Advocate General to undertake that inquiry. His right hon. and learned Friend did so, and he was bound to say that the Government and the country owed a considerable debt of gratitude to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for the time and trouble expended on the inquiry. He did not think that it would for a moment be disputed that this inquiry was not only conducted in an impartial spirit, but in such a manner as, as far as possible, to exhaust the whole subject. He did not propose to follow the hon. Member into all the particulars which he had brought forward; but he admitted at once that the Report of the Judge Advocate General contained facts of a most lamentable kind, and disclosed a state of things which urgently called for improvement in the administration of the departments concerned. Now, the two questions raised were, first of all, that defective articles had been passed into the Service; and, in the second place, the question of the whole system of inspection. Before proceeding to discuss these two questions, he should like, at the outset, to put before the Committee two things which it was right hon. Members should bear in mind in considering the facts as a whole. Of these, the first was that a great portion of the articles passed into the Service as defective were passed at a time when there was an enormous strain on the Department. A large number of men connected with it were taken off to Egypt at the time of the war; and also, in connection with the Expedition to Bechuanaland, the Department had to get a large number of articles in a great hurry. Secondly, a difficulty had arisen with regard to leather goods owing to the complete alteration which had taken place in the system of tanning. Under the old system, six months were required to complete the hides. We moved too fast in these days to allow six months to finish the process of tanning, and, accordingly, new methods were devised which made it very difficult for any Inspector of leather goods, however skilful and desirous of doing his work properly, to detect adulteration by mere handling. Dealing, then, first with the individuals concerned, he admitted in the fullest way that the evils were very serious evils. There could not be the least doubt that the number of defective articles passed into the Service was very large, and that they were passed by more than one man into the Service. When they came to examine who were the individuals responsible for this state of matters, it must not be forgotten that the Judge Advocate General examined the witnesses himself, and that he could form an estimate for himself what reliance to place upon them, and therefore the conclusion at which he arrived, on hearing all the evidence as regards individuals, even more than as regards the system, was entitled to great weight and consideration. Now, to take the case of the contractors. He thought it showed the animus with which the hon. Member had spoken, that he described Ross and Co. as the pet firm of the Government.

MR. HANBURY: I simply called them the pet firm of the Government, because they got nearly two-thirds of the whole Government contracts.

MR. E. STANHOPE went on to say that Ross and Co. were, if not the largest, certainly in some departments the chief manufacturers of these goods in the country. They had been employed for a great number of years after competition with other firms, not only by the War Office, but by other Departments in connection with various large contracts. They supplied a great number of articles which were rejected, and with respect to which the Judge Advocate General had made a Report. On looking carefully into that Report, he came to the conclusion that the circumstances under which some of these articles had been supplied were such that it was impossible to retain Messrs. Ross on the list of contractors of the War Office, and accordingly he struck their name off. He wrote to the Admiralty and asked them to take the same step, and the Admiralty also struck Messrs. Ross off the list of Admiralty contractors.

MR. HANBURY: When was that?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I do not know the date. To take the other people mentioned in the course of the discussion, there was the case of Sergeant Hawkins, who was condemned for being an untruthful witness. Although Hawkins had always been a good workman, and had been constantly commended as such, he felt after what had been said by the Judge Advocate General that he could not allow the man to remain in the responsible post of viewer, and he directed his name to be struck off at once. After this there came to him from Hawkins a humble petition, representing that after the number of years in which he had served the Department and had done thoroughly good service, it would be absolute ruin to him if he was absolutely excluded from employment. In reply, he declined to allow Hawkins to hold any responsible position, but said he might be allowed to do some work in one of the Establishments in order that he might not be absolutely deprived of bread.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Is that not the Establishment where a great deal of the adulteration has taken place?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No; no adulteration has taken place there.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I mean where the adulterated material has been used.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I take it that the viewers are thoroughly competent to discharge their duty, and Hawkins is not one of them. There was next the case of Mr. Spice, and he came to the conclusion that the Judge Advocate General was entirely right in his contention that Spice ought not originally to have been appointed. Spice, it was true, had some connection with the contractors Ross; but if they wanted to get a practical man, they must have one who had been employed by some firm or another in this country. But Spice's connection with the firm of Ross was certainly too intimate to make the choice a proper one. His hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury) put it all on Mr. Nepean, and said that gentleman appointed him, but that was absolutely not the fact. Originally, it was proposed by Commissary General Young that a man should be selected to fill the office; but Mr. Nepean objected, and insisted on advertising in order to get the best man for the post. Five candidates were selected, and Commissary General Young recommended that Spice was the best man; so that, at any rate, he was selected in the fairest way that could possibly be conceived, and was chosen honestly as being the best man.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) asked, whether it was to be understood that Mr. Nepean was over-ruled?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Practically, Commissary General Young over-ruled Mr. Nepean. Mr. Spice was appointed Inspector of Accoutrements. There was an enormous amount of work to be done in the Department, and Mr. Spice was thoroughly well qualified to attend to his own proper work. But it was impossible for him during the last few weeks of 1885 personally to superintend all the work which it was his duty to inspect.

Mr. E. Stanhope

He had therefore come to the conclusion that, although Mr. Spice did his best, he was physically incapable of doing all the work which he was called upon to do. He knew it had been said that Mr. Spice did not make sufficient complaint to the higher authorities that he was overtasked, and in that he was wrong. But, in his opinion, the main blame attached to those who imposed all these duties on Mr. Spice. One of the gravest errors in the whole business was the appointment of Captain Plunkett, who was absolutely unfitted in every way for the appointment.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): Who was responsible for the appointment?

MR. E. STANHOPE: He was appointed in 1883 by General Reilly. Mr. Spice had now been eight years in the service of the Department, and it had been proved that, so far as his physical powers allowed, he had done his work exceedingly well; and it could not be shown that Mr. Spice had used his position to favour any person, even including the Messrs. Ross. He came, therefore, to the conclusion that the justice of the case would be met by employing Mr. Spice at the work to which he was originally appointed, that of inspecting accoutrements. The next case was that of Colonel Rawnsley. The hon. Member had done quite right in tracing out the various people connected with this matter, and it was only proper that the House should know the steps which the Government had taken. He found nothing in the evidence to justify the condemnation of Colonel Rawnsley. No doubt, he was responsible for the inspection; but he had asked for additional viewers, and there was no evidence whatever that he had shown any partiality towards any particular contractors, or that he was personally responsible in the matters complained of. Commissary General Moloney was, no doubt, also a man as to whom inquiry should be made. He was closely examined before the Commission by Mr. Justice Stephen, but he was unable to discover that the Commission formed an unfavourable opinion of the manner in which he had discharged his duties. The extraordinary pressure made it very difficult for a proper view to be made; and Commissary General Moloney, when he recognized this, authorized the employment of 23 additional viewers according to Mr. Spice's request. There was, indeed, one point on which he had felt bound to ask for additional explanations from Colonel Moloney. This was as to the discrepancy between the specifications, patterns, and samples, which was quite indefensible. But the explanation given to him was this. There were 3,700 specifications to be examined, and when Colonel Moloney came to the Office in 1883, he found that there was an enormous amount of this work to be done, and he was obliged to put aside the work on which he was engaged in order to attend to it, and the evidence fully proved that he did do a great deal, during his term of office, to improve the state of things. According to Mr. Dunn, the men against whom the grave charge was made of passing unsound work were employés of Ross and Co. These men appeared to be respectable working men of a good class, and they had excellent characters. Every opportunity was given for making out a case against these men, but no case was established against them. With respect to the information furnished by Dunn and Moody, he was fully satisfied that their statement of insufficiency of inspection was well founded, and on this point he fully accepted the statement of the Judge Advocate General. Particular instructions had been issued that Messrs. Dunn and Moody should be dealt with with the utmost fairness; but the question of their promotion could only lie with those who were competent to say what they were qualified for. In a matter like this he, of course, could not interfere. How could he hold others to be responsible to himself if he insisted on the appointment by them of particular men? Adverting next to the other branch of the subject, he remarked that he was not going to say a word in defence of the system as it had existed. In times past it had resulted in a large number of inferior articles being introduced into the Service, and he admitted that it required a good deal of overhauling. He would try to point out the main defects which appeared to exist. The first defect in the system was the Rule requiring all articles to pass in order that they might be paid for before the 31st of March in each year. That had been complained of over and over again, and especially by Lord Morley's Committee and Sir James Stephen's Commission, and the Government had taken the Rule into serious consideration. He had been in communication with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he believed that before the time arrived next year, an arrangement would be arrived at which would put an end to the evil. The second point, and one of the gravest problems in his judgment, was the difference between the specifications and the sealed samples. There was a terrible discrepancy there, and one which nobody could justify for a moment. The present Commissary General of Ordnance had taken up the matter earnestly, and in the short time he had devoted to the work he had satisfied himself that the samples brought in were in accordance with the specifications, and he himself was quite certain that the attention which that officer had given to the subject would afford a good guarantee that the former state of things would not be allowed to recur. As to the inefficiency of the tests for weapons, he might say our tests were much more severe than the tests by Foreign Governments. As an instance of that he might mention that some years ago a large contractor for a very important article sent in goods several of which were rejected; and on his being asked whether it was worth while to go on opening the parcels, he replied—"No; I will take them back, and they shall go to the French Government." The contractor evidently thought that the French Government would accept them—which they actually did—and this circumstance showed that our test was more severe than that employed by Foreign Governments. He now came to the system of inspection, which had undoubtedly been very defective. Some hon. Members had suggested that, instead of this system of inspection, we should try to enforce the responsibility of contractors. He thought the War Department would be well advised if they struck contractors off the list when there were many rejections; but that was not enough, because warlike stores stood upon a special footing. If the Department were to rely on the responsibility of the contractors for warlike stores sent abroad the country would be put in a terrible difficulty, as the defects would not be found out until an expedition had started or the troops were engaged. It was, therefore, impossible to do without a system of inspection; but the inspection must be as thorough as it could be made.

MR. BRADLAUGH, interposing, said, that was what happened in the Egyptian Campaign. The articles were inspected here, and were afterwards found to be altogether inefficient.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he fully admitted that in the past the inspection had been lamentably deficient. All these goods had been inspected under the responsibility of the Commissary General of Ordnance; but the responsibility of that official had been altogether nominal. He had now been relieved of this nominal responsibility, and a competent officer had been appointed to act as Superintendent, directly responsible to the Military Heads of the War Office. He had been chosen as a man of undoubted experience, and he would be responsible for the whole conduct of the inspecting branch for these articles.

MR. HANBURY asked, what was the name of the officer?

MR. E. STANHOPE replied, that it was Colonel Barrington. His hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury) had made an attack on this officer; but he (Mr. E. Stanhope) challenged him to find any ground for the imputation. There was to be a special inspection of leather, which, in consequence of the system of adulteration and the new methods of tanning, had been very difficult to deal with. The manner of storing leather would likewise be improved. The hon. Gentleman had also alluded to the system of viewing and the difficulty of tracing who passed defective articles. It was now intended that each viewer when he inspected an article should put a special mark upon it, so as to bring home the responsibility for its acceptance to him. The hon. Member had attacked Mr. Nepean, a public servant of many years' standing; but he (Mr. E. Stanhope) might mention that neither Lord Morley's Committee nor Sir James Stephen's Commission found anything adverse to Mr. Nepean, nor had the Judge Advocate General said a word against him. The hon. Member attacked Mr. Nepean because he said he gave a number of contracts to Messrs. Ross, who employed sweaters. Messrs. Ross obtained the contracts in the ordinary way because they tendered at a lower price than others; and it was not until the recent evidence given before the Committee of the House of Lords that he had any idea that such an accusation was made against them. He felt bound to say, in justice to that firm, that their side of the case had not yet been heard before the Committee. He could say, however, that the War Office never sanctioned the giving of contracts to sweaters, and great care was taken in the Clothing Department that the clothing needed should be specially ordered from factories in order to prevent the work getting into the hands of the sweaters. As to the charge made by the hon. Member that Mr. Nepean had allowed contractors to take articles away after they had been condemned, in order to alter them, if the hon. Member had referred to the Answer to Question 3,364 he would have seen that the answer to that charge was that goods were frequently rejected for a defective stitch or two, but that the contractors always had an opportunity given them of putting those stitches right. So it was in this case. What the hon. Member alleged against Mr. Nepean amounted to nothing less than criminal conspiracy.

MR. HANBURY said, the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman was the contractor's own explanation. Mr. Ross distinctly stated, with regard to the hides, that if he had been allowed to take them back and re-dress them he would have appealed to the Director of Contracts and beaten the Department.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he could not offer any personal opinion on the subject, but if the hides were re-dressed in such a manner as to satisfy the proper tests, he could see no objection to their reception. Therefore, he could not help feeling that it was a little hard upon a public servant like Mr. Nepean that he should be attacked in the way the hon. Member had attacked him. He thought that if his hon. Friend had thought a little more, he would hardly have attacked a gentleman who had done such good service without basing his attack upon a little better case. He himself was not responsible for particular transactions, but he was responsible for the system now being established at the War Office, and he was perfectly prepared to accept that responsibility. If nothing else could be said to have been done during the time he had fulfilled the duties of his present Office, he should, at any rate, have the satisfaction in his own mind of knowing that he had done his utmost to make the inspection of all war-like stores in all Departments of the Army independent and real.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.) said, he believed the Committee would agree that the hon. Member for Preston had, in a perfectly fair manner, laid his statement before them, and, if he might be allowed to say so, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had spoken with great fairness, and explained with great facility and ability the steps he had taken to guard against the repetition of a state of things which could not but be regarded as constituting a great public danger. He was bound, however, to remark that the Committee must still be left in a state of some bewilderment and almost astonishment, at the remarkable evidence laid before them as to the system which had prevailed, and was still prevailing, in the Department. His right hon. Friend has stated that there could be no doubt whatever that the system in past years had been extremely bad, and that under that system a very large number of defective articles had been passed into the Public Service, that very large number representing, he (Lord Randolph Churchill) supposed, a very large sum of public money wasted. But it was most extraordinary that even the Secretary of State, with all his desire to re-organize the Department and assist the public, had not been able under the peculiar system prevailing to place his finger on one single person as being responsible for that great public crime. He was not going to argue against the conclusion at which the right hon. Gentleman had arrived, when he said that Sergeant Hawkins was an untrustworthy witness, and he agreed with the judgment of the right hon. Gentleman that he was perfectly unreliable. But still he remained in his position. Colonel Rawnsley apparently had held a position of some control, and would in a private capacity, no doubt, have prevented what had occurred to some extent, yet it was not in the power of the Secretary of State to bring the smallest accusation against Colonel Rawnsley. Then, as to Commissary General Moloney, the Secretary of State said that, although, perhaps he did not do all that he ought to have done with regard to the articles supplied being equal to the specifications, yet Colonel Moloney had a great deal of work to perform, that he did all he could that, on the whole, he was doing good work for the State, and that he could not get rid of Colonel Moloney. Then there was Mr. Spice. His conduct was reviewed, but the right hon. Gentleman had come to the conclusion that no blame could legitimately be attached to him. Then they came to the case of Colonel Barrington, who also occupied a position of high control in this Department, and might be held in some way responsible for what had occurred. But no. It appeared there was not a particle of evidence in the Report of the Judge Advocate General to show that any responsibility attached to him or that there was anything that reflected upon him in the slightest degree, so that Colonel Barrington was now in a more responsible position than before. Of course, this might all be very right, and he did not think the Committee was in a position to dispute the conclusion of the right hon. Gentleman. But what he was most concerned about was this—he wanted to draw the attention of the Committee to the state of things under which an immense sum of money for many years past had been utterly wasted and thrown away. The occurrences had been brought to light, and yet the Secretary of State, with all the machinery at his disposal, and the House of Commons with all the great powers at its command, were unable to visit a single individual with the smallest penalty. That was the moral to be drawn from what had transpired. He had only one further remark to make, and it was in reference to it, that he made a strong and special appeal to his hon. Friend not to divide the Committee on his Amendment. If his hon. Friend divided one of two things would happen, either he would put the Government in a minority which would be attended by much inconvenience, and that after the explanation of the Secretary of State would certainly be a course of some injustice. On the other hand, his hon. Friend might be put in a minority, and if that were so, the public, instead of drawing the conclusion they wished them to draw, would come to the conclusion that there was not much in the complaint of the hon. Member for Preston, and that the Secretary of State had completely disposed of it. And there was this further consideration—that if the Committee adopted the Motion by a large majority it might be understood outside that the Committee had condemned the changes that had been made by the Secretary of State with a view to guarding against a repetition of these occurrences. That was what he hoped the Committee would do. The Committee upstairs had guarded itself from expressing the slightest opinion on the various changes the Secretary of State had made with a view to the better organization of our military affairs. No opinion could be properly expressed until those changes had been tried. The right hon. Gentleman had constituted, and, for all he (Lord Randolph Churchill) knew, properly constituted, at very considerable cost, a large Department charged with the independent inspection of the articles manufactured for the use of Her Majesty's troops. The changes might or might not work well, and they might or might not preserve us in the future from the grave scandals which had up to now occurred. But, if the Committee divided on the Motion, and carried the Vote by a large majority, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State in the future, should the arrangements turn out badly, would be perfectly able to turn round on the House of Commons, and say—"Well, I told you of the changes I had made, and you approved them by a large majority." Under all the circumstances of the case, and, as the only motive of his hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury) was the good of the Public Service, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would rest satisfied with the debate he had originated, and with the assurance that the Committee was grateful to him for the great attention he had bestowed upon this matter, and not seek to press his Motion further, because, if the Division was hostile to him, the result would be that, instead of doing good, he would be doing a positive evil to the public interest.

COLONEL DUNCAN (Finsbury, Holborn) said, that the Secretary of State for War stated in the course of his speech, that oral testimony was more impressive than written testimony. Perhaps as he was a member of Lord Morley's Committee, and also of the Special Committee on Saddlery, he might be permitted to detail his experiences. The impression, which was left on the minds of Lord Morley's Committee was that, while there had been a great deal of incompetency among the Government officials, there had been no corruption; and the result of the inquiry conducted by the Judge Advocate General generally tallied with that of the former Committee. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) had said that the Government ought to be loyal to the country as well as loyal to its officials; he (Colonel Duncan) maintained that the Government ought to be loyal to its officials when they were good, but not loyal to them when they were bad. Two or three men who had been so severely attacked were, to the best of their ability, doing the work for which they were engaged, and certainly they were absolutely free from corruption as far as the Committee could ascertain. The name of the Director of Contracts had been mentioned; that gentleman was examined by the Committee on Saddlery; the whole system at work was put before the Committee in the most open way; no question was left unanswered; and he thought that a more worthy and excellent public servant did not exist in the country. The Secretary of State for War had omitted to mention one thing. The right hon. Gentleman said that among the discoveries he had made was the great difficulty of getting specifications to agree with the sealed pattern. The difficulty the Committee experienced was to get the article manufactured to agree with the sealed pattern, and that was a much more important thing. They found that some thousands of certain articles had been accepted by the viewers which were of a totally different pattern to the sealed pattern which was given to the viewers to follow. That showed incompetency on the part of the viewers. Although great temptations had been thrown in the way of viewers in their dealings with wealthy contractors, no corruption on their part had ever been shown. As one who had sat on the Special Committees, and heard the evidence given, and, as one quite conscious of the great weakness of our system, he rejoiced to find that now efforts were being made to improve that system.
